ALFRED M'MURTRIE.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2066) for the relief of Alfred McMurtrie.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Alfred McMurtrie, of Luzerne County, Pennsylvania, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $115, for hay, corn, and oats taken for the use of and used by the Army of the United States, with interest from January 1, 1864, at 6 per cent.

The report (by Mr. HIESTAND) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2066) for the relief of Alfred McMutrie, report as follows:

The facts out of which this claim for relief arises will be found stated in House report of the Committee on War Claims No. 1840, first session of the Forty-eighth Congress, a copy of which is hereto appended.

The committee adopt the said report as their own, and report back the bill, and recommend its passage with an amendment, as follows:

In line 8, after the words "United States," strike out the following: "with interest from January 1, 1864, at 6 per cent."

[House Report No. 1840, Forty-eighth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5583) for the relief of Alfred McMurtrie, submit the following report:

The facts of the case are these: That on the 5th of December, 1863, and January 18, 1864, Captain Miles, of the Twenty-first Regiment Pennsylvania Cavalry, took from the claimant, in Luzerne County, Pennsylvania, the following quartermaster's supplies, to wit: 1,300 pounds of hay, 30 bushels of corn, and 50 bushels of oats, and gave receipts and vouchers for the same; that the price agreed upon at the time was, for the hay, $25 per ton; for the corn, $1.62 per bushel, and for the oats, $1 per bushel, amounting in all to $115.

February 9, 1883, Mr. Quimby, an agent of the Quartermaster's Department, who was charged with the duty of investigating this claim, after reviewing the evidence, says:

"The records of the office of the adjutant-general of this State [Pennsylvania] show that on the 23d day of August, 1883, the Twenty-first Regiment Pennsylvania Cavalry was ordered to Harrisburg, whence a detachment, consisting of Companies C, E, K, L, and M, was sent on duty to Pottsville and Scranton, Pa. George L. Mills, captain Company L, Twenty-first Regiment Pennsylvania Cavalry, was mustered into the service of the United States August 10, 1863, and was mustered out February 20, 1864. From the evidence annexed, no question exists in my mind but that the forage claimed for was actually consumed by Government animals, and that it was delivered and receipts given to claimant therefor and lost as alleged. I respectfully recommend that if, upon examination, the said receipts are found not to have been presented and paid, this claim be allowed for the full amount claimed."

After an examination to ascertain if the receipts were presented and paid, the Third Auditor, on the 16th day of July, 1883, reported "No payments to Alfred McMurtrie, of Luzerne County, Pennsylvania."

The amendment of the committee was read, as follows:

In line 8, after the words "United States," strike out the following:
"With interest from January 1, 1864, at 6 per centum."

The amendment of the committee was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HIESTAND, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

THOMAS M'BRIDE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4836) for the relief of Thomas McBride.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Thomas McBride the sum of $1,000 in full compensation for the barge Henry Bartley, lost while under charter to the United States Government.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. HIESTAND) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Thomas McBride, beg leave to report:

The facts out of which this claim for relief arises will be found stated in House report of the Committee on War Claims No. 587, first session of the Forty-eighth Congress, and are in substance as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1365) for the relief of Thomas McBride, submit the following report:

The facts out of which this bill for relief arises will be found stated in House report of Committee on War Claims No. 1919, second session Forty-seventh Congress, a copy of which is hereto appended.

The committee adopt said report as their own, and report back the bill, and with the recommendation that it do pass.

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1391) for the relief of Thomas McBride, report as follows:

That this claim is for compensation for the barge Henry Bartley, lost while under charter to the United States Government. Claim stated at $1,000.

It appears from the proof submitted that the barge when lost was in the military service of the United States, under a charter-party which contained a stipulation as follows:

"The war risk will be borne by the United States; the marine risk by the owners until under orders south of Cape Henry (the southern cape of Chesapeake Bay), after which the marine risk will be borne by the owners until they reach that latitude on their return."

The evidence shows that the loss of the barge was in latitude north of Cape Henry, and was occasioned by a marine risk.

The testimony of John Tucker, Capt. H. C. Hodges, and A. C. Hall is offered to show the following, namely: That Mr. Tucker, then assistant Secretary of War, hired this barge from A. C. Hall, agent for the claimant; that the agreement then made was that the United States should bear all the risks, both war and marine; that a charter-party was not then drawn up because of pressure of business, but that the boat went immediately into the service; that Captain Hodges had been detailed by the Quartermaster-General to execute charter-parties for such boats as should be hired by Mr. Tucker; that some time after the entry into service of this barge a charter-party was filled up by a clerk of Captain Hodges, and was executed by Captain Hodges and A. C. Hall, and through inadvertence the clause above quoted was not stricken out.

This claim was filed in the Treasury Department on the 25th of March, 1863, and on the 11th of January thereafter, to wit, 1864, the Third Auditor addressed a letter to the claimant, in which he stated that in his opinion the evidence showed that the barge was lost by a marine risk while in latitude north of Cape Henry, and as the charter-party showed that he had assumed such risk the United States was not liable. In response to said letter the claimant asserted that the actual agreement was that the United States should bear the marine risk, and that it was through mere inadvertence that the clause to the contrary was allowed to remain in the charter, and offered to file evidence to establish the said fact. Thereupon the Third Auditor decided not to receive such testimony, and addressed the claimant as follows, to wit:

"TREASURY DEPARTMENT, February 3, 1864.

"SIR: I have received your letter of the 25th ultimo, in which you say that you have called on Mr. John Tucker in regard to your claim for the loss of your barge Henry Bartley, and have been informed by him that he has forwarded a letter to this office from Capt. H. C. Hodges, assistant quartermaster, United States Army, in which he states that the marine risk on all the barges chartered for the McClellan expedition was assumed by the United States; and that he (Tucker) wrote that if any of the charter-parties read otherwise it is owing to the omission to erase the clause in which the marine risk was assumed by the owners, and was entirely unintentional. In reply I can only say that parol evidence can never be admitted to vary a written contract, when there can be no question as to its provisions, although it is sometimes admitted to explain an ambiguous clause. Your only relief is to Congress for relief."

The affidavit of Captain Hodges, filed with the papers, is to the effect that he chartered the barge Henry Bartley by direction of Hon. John Tucker, then Assistant Secretary of War, with the understanding that the Government would assume the marine risk, and through mistake the words to the contrary were not stricken from the charter.

In view of the foregoing statement of facts your committee are constrained to hold that the claim is valid, and report back the bill with the recommendation that it do pass.

Your committee adopt the said report as their own, and report herewith a bill, and recommend its passage.

On motion of Mr. HIESTAND, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

EMMA H. FISH.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1185) for the relief of Emma H. Fish.

Mr. GEDDES. My colleague on the committee [Mr. LYMAN] having charge of this bill requested that it should be informally passed over, not to lose its place upon the Calendar. He is necessarily absent from the House, as the House knows, on official business. I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was informally passed over, not to lose its place on the Calendar.

ALEXANDER K. SHEPARD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 33) for the relief of Alexander K. Shepard.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and required to pay to Alexander K. Shepard, of Tuscaloosa, Ala., the sum of $17,268.53, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The report (by Mr. MCKENNA) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 33) for the relief of Alexander K. Shepard, have examined the same, and report as follows:

The facts on account of which Mr. Shepard claims relief were ascertained and reported to the House by the Committee on Claims in the first session of last Congress, also by the Senate committee in the second session of said Congress. The investigation of this committee coincides with that of said other committees, and their conclusions are adopted by us, except we think that Mr. Shepard should be allowed the full amount stated in the bill as not beyond the remedy he is entitled to. The passage of the bill is therefore recommended.

The reports above referred to are hereto attached and made part hereof.

[Senate Report No. 1339, Forty-eighth Congress, second session.]

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 688) for the relief of A. K. Shepard, have examined the same, and report as follows:

The material facts of this case are set out in the report of the House Committee on Claims, made at the last session of the present Congress, and which is here adopted, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 28) for the relief of A. K. Shepard, submit the following report:

The evidence in this case shows that on the 15th day of December, 1865, the Government of the United States sold in the city of Selma, Ala., at public outcry, after due notice given, a large lot old iron, brass, and copper, the débris and material on hand of the naval gun foundry and arsenal of the late so-called Confederate States. The said sale was made by the collector of customs for the port of Mobile, Ala., acting under the express authority and direction of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States. That A. K. Shepard became the purchaser of said material at the price of $17,268.53, and paid the same by order of the President of the United States to General Wager Swayne, assistant commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau, and in charge of the Department of Alabama. That soon after Shepard obtained possession of said iron, &c., he was dispossessed of the same by John Hardy, the marshal for the district of Alabama, who acted under the orders of Richard Busteed, United States district judge for the district of Alabama, and that the said marshal, by order of the said judge, sold the said iron, with instructions to hold the proceeds subject to his orders. That in conformity with said order the marshal deposited only the sum of $5,858.80 in the First National Bank of Selma, though he received a sum therefor five times greater, at least $30,000. That on the 30th day of May, 1871, the said court dismissed the suit for libel and ordered the money deposited in the First National Bank of Selma, as stated above, to be paid to the said Shepard, thus establishing the validity of the first sale of the said property as made by the Government on the 15th day of December, 1865, and the legal rights of the said Shepard.

That before the said decision was made the First National Bank of Selma had failed and passed into the hands of the Comptroller of the Currency for the United States for liquidation, and that on the 8th day of June, 1874, the said Comptroller paid the said Shepard the sum of $2,050.52 as his pro rata share of the dividends arising from the assets of the said bank, and on the 22d day of December, 1882, paid the said Shepard the further sum of $679.62 as his portion of the final distribution of the assets of said First National Bank of Selma, Ala.

That before the said Shepard was dispossessed of the said iron, brass, and copper he had sold a small portion of the same, amounting in the aggregate to $1,504.77; that he paid out for guarding and protecting said material $1,424.45, which left him the net sum of $80.32, which, together with the sum of $2,730.14 received from the Comptroller, makes a total net balance received by him of $2,810.46, without any allowance for the heavy court expenses and other necessary outlays in pursuit of his rights, which are shown to equal that amount.

In consideration of all which your committee report favorably and recommend the passage of the bill.

From the paper before your committee it appears that before the seizure of the property by the marshal Shepard had contracted with responsible parties to sell the lot of scrap-iron, &c., purchased by the Government at prices which would have realized him a profit of at least $12,731. It appears that the marshal first seized the property under the direction of the United States district attorney, who shortly thereafter instituted proceedings in district court, at the May term, 1866, for and on behalf of the United States, to have said property confiscated because it had been used and employed in aiding and promoting the rebellion. This libel was filed on the 20th of July, 1866. The warrant of seizure was promptly issued, came to the marshal's hands on the 30th July, 1866, and on the same day the marshal made affidavit that the property could not be protected, &c., and asked for an immediate order of sale. This was approved by the district attorney, and the order was at once made by the judge. It appears from the evidence that the marshal sold the property for about $30,000; but does not appear to have accounted for the funds, except to the extent of the $5,858.80 deposited in the First National Bank of Selma. While the Government is not generally liable for the wrongful acts of its agents and officers, the present case is so exceptional in its character as to make it simply an act of justice to return to said Shepard his purchase-money, less the amount already received. The Government sells him property to which it had the absolute and unquestioned title and places him in possession of the same; other agents of the Government, disregarding the title thus obtained, deprive him of possession, sell the property over again under an ex parte order made without notice, and the funds thence arising are lost in great measure while in the custody of the Government. Claimant is entitled to this relief. We therefore report back the bill to the Senate with the recommendation that it do pass.

The purchaser of property from the Government has certainly, in equity and good conscience, the right to expect that the Government will not itself either defeat the title or disturb the possession which it has vested in or conferred upon its vendee.

But aside from this view of the case, it may well be claimed that when the Government takes into its possession and custody property under a claim of ownership or of right to subject the same to forfeiture, which is not valid, there is an obligation resting upon it to protect and preserve the property or its proceeds against loss by its own agents, to the end that the same may be restored to the rightful owner.

The whole proceeding in the present case was a most remarkable one, and it would be an act of great injustice not to protect the Government vendee, or at least make him whole by returning him so much of his purchase-money as he has not already received. The bill proposes to repay to him the entire amount of purchase-money, $17,268.50. It appears that the claimant has already received the sum of $2,810.46, and your committee concur in the conclusion of the House report that this sum should be deducted from the amount of purchase-money paid, $17,268.50, which will leave the sum of $14,458.04 that should be returned to him. Your committee accordingly recommend that the bill be amended by striking out, in lines 3 and 4 of the bill, the words "seventeen thousand two hundred and sixty-eight dollars and fifty cents," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "fourteen thousand four hundred and fifty-eight dollars and four cents," and, as thus amended, that the bill do pass.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, this bill was reported by my colleague upon the committee [Mr. MCKENNA]. As is known to the House, he is at present absent attending the funeral of Senator MILLER, and requested me in his absence to take charge of the report when it came before the House. I understand that the bill was reported by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. MARTIN], to whom I now yield so much time as he may desire.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Chairman, the report accompanying this bill, which has been read, is so full and complete as to the details of the claim on which the bill for the relief is founded, that it seems to me that I can add little, if anything, to it, and as I am not disposed to consume unnecessarily the time of the House I shall do no more than answer, or undertake to answer, such questions as may be asked with reference to the bill by any gentleman upon the floor who is disposed to make inquiry about it. I think the whole matter connected with it is set out fully in the report of the committee, and if there be no disposition to discuss it, or no desire for further information, I ask that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to inquire of my friend from Alabama, in view of the fact that both Houses agreed upon a less sum in the last Congress, that is to say the sum of $14,458.04, instead of the amount set forth here in this report, whether it would not be better, and as likely to do ample justice to the claimant, to accept the conclusions of the two Houses in the last Congress as to the sum which should be paid to this claimant instead of adopting the present bill?

I regard the case as very strong and clear upon the facts set forth; the only question would seem to be as to the propriety of making a deduction of the $2,810.46 which has been already received by the claimant from the proceeds of the money paid into the bank.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the gentleman from Indiana I wish to state that although a part of the money which was realized from the sale of this property came into the hands of Mr. Shepard, yet it did not amount to more than a small proportion of what were the profits upon the property realized, and which he would have realized himself had he been permitted to collect the money.

And further, every dollar of money that came into his hands, as he has testified under oath, was expended in necessary costs of litigation, which litigation was brought about without his consent and contrary to his wishes; indeed, litigation into which he was absolutely forced. He did not receive a solitary cent for it, and has spent since the 15th of December, 1865, out of this money, more than $1,700 on this account.

All that this bill seeks to do is to restore to him the sum of money which he expended in making a purchase from the Government of property which the Government had the right to sell, and which it delivered after it sold to him, and which was afterward by authority of the Government taken from him.

That sum of money which he paid for this property was paid by direction of the President of the United States to General Wager Swayne, and was covered into the Treasury of the United States.

Now, my friend from Indiana suggests that, as it was recommended in the reports made to the Senate during the Forty-eighth Congress, and also to the House in that Congress, that a smaller sum be paid than this bill recommends, it would be advisable to accept that modification of the present bill. But, sir, it occurs to me that when we look into the facts of the case and find that this claimant has not received a solitary dollar of the money paid out upon a sale had by order of the Government, and when we look at the further fact that the Government received, and that there went into the Government Treasury, over $17,000 of this man's money, of which he has been deprived for a period of twenty-one years, it seems to me that there is no reason why we should deduct that sum which was afterward taken from him for the purpose of paying the court, interest, and other expenses incident to the litigation into which he was forced. I hope, therefore, that my friend from Indiana will not insist upon the modification which he suggests. I do not think Mr. Shepard ought to lose the money, and I am sure a statement of the facts do not warrant the adoption of a provision which would force him to lose it.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I remember this claim. It was before the committee in the last Congress, and was favorably reported.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The gentleman can compress his remarks within five minutes?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I will not occupy but a few minutes.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I will yield the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. If the gentleman from New Jersey wants the floor I will yield it to him now and will take it in my own right hereafter.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I am willing to afford ample opportunity to discuss the bill, but I do not want to be understood as yielding the floor.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I will take the floor in my own right.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I ask that this bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I was proceeding to say that this was favorably reported to the House by the committee of the last Congress, but for a smaller sum, for the reason that it was thought that Mr. Shepard should be allowed what he had actually paid in. To go beyond that, it seems to me, we should consider what he had lost, if he has sustained any loss, over and above this sum.

This bill proposes now to give him a round sum of $17,000; and it proposes to allow him a sum of some two thousand and odd dollars, which he had received, as compensation against any loss he might have sustained on account of expenses which he incurred. This, I think, can hardly be sustained logically. If he is entitled to anything more it must be a specific or determinable sum, which can be exactly ascertained.

Mr. FORNEY. But he paid out over $1,400 taking care of this property.

Mr. MARTIN. It was over $1,700.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. But this bill proposes to give him just what he had received out of the money he had paid into the bank, and not to attempt to cover his expenses or losses. I submit we should either draw the line on the exact sum which he paid in, or else should cover his expenses and his losses outside of that. There is no consistency in allowing this additional round sum as an offset. I agree with my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that it would be better to accept the recommendation of the committees of both Houses of the last Congress, and allow the actual sum.

Mr. BUCHANAN. In response to the gentleman from Ohio, I will say there is no round sum or lumping in this bill whatever. The committee were satisfied from evidence before them that the amounts disbursed by this gentleman in protecting his rights against the unauthorized acts of United States officials exceeded by a considerable amount the moneys which he had received. They are willing, therefore, to allow him that credit. That is the whole situation in a nutshell. Unless there be any other motion to be submitted, I insist on my motion that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

J. M. LOBBAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 416) for the relief of J. M. Lobban; reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, instructed to direct Maj. G. B. Dandy, quartermaster, United States Army, to issue duplicate check numbered 20, for $4,608.50, dated April 26, 1884, in favor of J. M. Lobban, on the Stock-Growers' National Bank, Cheyenne, Wyo., in place of one lost on or about May 3, 1884: Provided, That the Secretary of War be satisfied the same has not been paid: And provided further, That said J. M. Lobban shall first execute a bond, with sureties to be approved by the Secretary of War, in due form, to save the United States harmless against any loss or injury by reason of such duplicate check or the payment of the original.

The report (by Mr. MCKENNA) was read, as follows:

That they recommend the passage of the bill with the following amendment: After the word "paid," in line 9, insert, "he shall instruct the Omaha National Bank, of Omaha, Nebr., to pay such check."

The Stock-Growers' National Bank, Cheyenne, Wyo., on which the check mentioned in the bill was drawn, has ceased to exist; hence the necessity for the amendment.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I move the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to have the report corrected. Instead of the words "ceased to exist" it should be "ceased to be a United States depository." The statement in the report does injustice to the institution.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I suppose by unanimous consent the report can be corrected as it will appear in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], which will appear in the RECORD, amount to a correction.

The amendment was adopted; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

E. P. M'NEAL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4839) for the relief of E. P. McNeal; reported from the Committee on Claims.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to E. P. McNeal, of Hardeman County, Tennessee, the sum of $12,781.81, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the same to be in full compensation for all property taken from the said NcNeal by the United States Army during the war.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Unless some gentleman objects, I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. STONE, of Kentucky) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the petition of E. P. McNeal, having considered the same and accompanying papers, submit the following report:

The committee find the facts to be as stated in House Report No. 443, Forty-fifth Congress, second session, which report is hereto annexed and made a part of this report.

[House Report No. 443, Forty-fifth Congress, second session.]

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the petition of E. P. McNeal, having considered the same, submit the following report:

E. P. McNeal resided in Hardeman County, Tennessee, during the war. The claim is for lumber, wood, horses, mules, and farm produce alleged to have been taken and used by the Army in 1862, 1863, and 1864. It was filed in the office of the Quartermaster-General, under the act of July 4, 1864, and finally rejected by him in October, 1874, for the reason, as assigned, that that officer was not convinced that the claimant was loyal. In rejecting the claim the Quartermaster-General expressed a purpose not to reopen it on the additional evidence presented, "in justice to thirteen thousand claimants whose claims are still undecided and who have rights to be heard."

It would certainly be a hardship if the petitioner must be permanently deprived of his rights solely on account of a lack of force in the Quartermaster-General's Office, and the grounds relied upon for bringing the case before Congress appear sufficient.

By joint resolution No. 99, first session Thirty-ninth Congress, the provisions of the act of July 4, 1864, were extended to the loyal citizens of the State of Tennessee; McNeal took the oath of allegiance to the Government of the United States in July, 1862, prior to the taking of his property. Under the construction uniformly given to that act, when a person took the oath of allegiance and kept it faithfully he is held loyal thereafter. The question arose in McNeal's case in 1863. On the occupation of that section by the Federal Army in 1862, a large quantity of his cotton was seized and sold, and he applied to the Secretary of War for the restoration of the proceeds. The application was referred to Judge-Advocate-General Holt for his opinion, from which the following extracts are taken:

* * * "The sixth section of the act of 17th July, 1862, declares that if any person being engaged in armed rebellion against the Government of the United States, or aiding or abetting such rebellion, shall not within sixty days after public warning and proclamation by the President, cease to aid, countenance, or abet such rebellion, and return to his allegiance to the United States, all the estate and property, moneys, stocks, and credits of such person shall be liable to seizure, &c. This must be construed to be a declaration by implication that, if such person does comply with the requirements of the statute, his property of every kind shall be protected from seizure. The exemption for complying with the law must necessarily be held to be as broad and comprehensive as the penalty denounced for a failure to do so. What support, or aid and comfort beyond the contract referred to, had been previously given to the rebellion by the petitioner does not appear; but, whatever it may have been, he, on the 22d of July, 1862, five days after the passage of the law, returned to his allegiance and took the oath which has been already mentioned. This appears to have been done in good faith, and it is not alleged or pretended that he has since violated that oath or been guilty of any disloyal practices. It is quite clear, therefore, that if this cotton or its proceeds can be regarded as his property, it was not liable to seizure under the sixth section of the act of 17th July.

* * * "A great principle of public policy is involved in this case, and no technical objections should be allowed to restrain or embarrass its operations. It was the object of Congress to induce those in rebellion against the Government to lay down their arms and return to their allegiance, and to prevail on them to do so a complete amnesty for the past, with limited exceptions, has been offered by solemn legislative enactment. When the terms thus proposed have been accepted and complied with by a citizen previously in rebellion, good faith, as well as the best interests of the Government, require that the full benefits of this legislation and of this policy shall be secured to him.

"I recommend, therefore, that Brigadier-General Ross be ordered at once to pay over to the petitioner the $10,000, the proceeds of the cotton, and which he now holds awaiting the decision of the War Department upon the question raised."

This decision was approved by Hon. E. M. Stanton, then Secretary of War, in November, 1862, and the proceeds were paid to McNeal accordingly.

The petitioner's loyalty was again passed upon favorably by the accounting officers of the Treasury in November, 1871, and the sum of $1,294.04 was paid him on vouchers for hay, corn, fodder, &c., taken and used by the Army in August, September, and October, 1862. These vouchers had been originally filed in the Office of the Quartermaster-General as a part of this claim, and were presented to the Treasury Department for settlement with the acquiescence of the Quartermaster-General. The proof offered in support of loyalty was the same as now offered, with the exception of such proof as has since been filed. The case was referred by the Treasury Department to the Bureau of Justice in the War Department for opinion as to the sufficiency of the proof of McNeal's loyalty. After considering the effect of the oath of July, 1862, and going over the testimony critically and at length, the opinion concludes:

"There are thus twelve witnesses, unimpeached in their character, who under oath affirm the continued loyalty of the claimant—not as 'reputed,' nor as gathered as hearsay, or any popular estimate of him, but as a fact within their own knowledge, derived from intimate and long-continued personal intercourse with him, and from constant personal observation of his conduct. Among these are three officers of the Government who, being unassailed, are, by their position as its trusted agents, entitled to its confidence. Not a single witness who has spoken under the sanction of an oath has charged the claimant either with disloyal conversation or with practices of any kind inconsistent with the obligations of allegiance assumed by him in July, 1862. Opposed to this array of testimony is the statement found in the printed voucher and the certificate of Assistant Quartermaster Eddy; but these speak only of reputation and of the sayings of certain 'Union men,' not named, not under oath, and not subjected to cross-examination. In response to these, and sufficient to neutralize them, is the certificate of Assistant Quartermaster Clary, stationed at Memphis, Tenn., that the claimant, though originally a secessionist, having, on the occupation of Bolivar by the Federal troops, taken the oath of allegiance, the report was that 'he had fulfilled its conditions.' Guided to its conclusion solely by the evidence on file, this bureau can not but regard the claimant's loyalty as established so far as any issue of fact can be settled by human testimony."

This opinion is signed by J. Holt, Judge-Advocate-General. It was concurred in by the accounting officers of the Treasury, and the vouchers were paid as stated.

Since these vouchers were allowed and paid by the Treasury Department, other testimony as to loyalty has been taken, and is now presented.

W. H. Morgan, late assistant adjutant-general and brevet brigadier-general, testifies that he was for some time during the war assistant adjutant-general for the district of West Tennessee; that he was well acquainted with McNeal, and that he was regarded as a Union man by the military authorities after 1862; that as soon as the Federal troops reached his neighborhood he was one of the first to take the oath, and his conduct was such as to gain for him the confidence of the officers. The witness concludes:

"Any one who states that McNeal was disloyal from the first moment he had an opportunity to take the oath must do it from mistaken information or personal motives."

Josiah Deloach, postmaster at Memphis, Tenn., testifies that he has been well and intimately acquainted with McNeal for many years past, and that since he took the oath of allegiance in July, 1862, "he has at all times been loyal to the Government of the United States, and kept his said oath inviolate."

Thomas G. Patrick testifies "that said E. P. McNeal, since he took the amnesty oath, under President Lincoln's proclamation, in July, 1862, has at all times been true and loyal to the Government of the United States, and a supporter of the same."

D. J. Benner, chief quartermaster on General Hurlburt's staff, while that officer commanded at Bolivar, and who has been before the committee, testifies:

* * * "The said McNeal had the reputation of being an unqualified Union man, and was so considered by those persons, residents of that section of country, whose loyalty the Government has fully recognized; it was a matter of common report that he took the oath of allegiance at the very earliest opportunity, and that he faithfully lived up to his obligation. I always, while stationed at Bolivar, and when hearing his name mentioned in Memphis, believed him to be a consistent Union man, and have never had any reason since to change that opinion."

If any doubts existed in the minds of any as to McNeal's loyalty upon the settlement of his vouchers by the Treasury Department, it would seem that they ought to be wholly removed by the positive testimony taken subsequently. The committee are of the opinion that the testimony abundantly justifies the conclusion that the petitioner was loyal within the meaning of the act under which he seeks relief.

McNeal owned two plantations, one near Bolivar, and the other some 12 miles distant. These appear to have been in a good state of cultivation, and there is no question as to his ownership of the property. Some twenty-five witnesses testify to the taking of the property by the United States Army, and to quantity or numbers and value. Of these upward of twenty made affidavits to the taking and conversion in 1865, when the circumstances relative thereto were probably fresh in memory. The account was made out in July, 1865. The case has been investigated by officers of the Quartermaster-General's Department, and no question has been raised as to the validity of the claim so far as relates to the property. The witnesses include Pyboss, postmaster at Bolivar; Boyle, an internal-revenue officer; Col. D. J. Benner, late an assistant quartermaster; D. E. Coon, late colonel of the Second Iowa Cavalry; and a number of citizens of evident respectability. Colonels Benner and Coon have been before the committee in person. The former testifies that about 10,000 bushels of corn and 80,000 pounds of fodder were taken in 1862 by himself and by an officer acting under him. He also corroborates the taking of the lumber and wood. Colonel Coon testifies to the taking of eight mules and 600 bushels of corn. The amount claimed was $16,642, which is somewhat reduced by throwing out a small portion which was not deemed sufficiently proved, and by substituting prices allowed by the Quartermaster-General at the various dates of the taking of the items charged.

The account is stated as follows:

9,895 bushels of corn, at 50 cents	$4,947 50
790 bushels of corn, at $1	790 00
80,600 pounds of fodder, at 75 cents per cwt	604 50
300 pounds of hay, at $15 per ton	2 25
13,504 feet of lumber, at $15 per 1,000	202 56
865 cords of wood, at $2 per cord	1,730 00
1,000 cords of wood (timber), at $1 per cord	1,000 00
24 mules, at $125 each	3,000 00
1 horse	150 00
2 horses, at $115 each	230 00
Wagon and harness	125 00
Total	12,781 81

"The committee recommend the passage of the accompanying bill."

The committee therefore adopt said House report as the report of this committee, and recommend that the amount named in that report be allowed.

Your committee report the accompanying bill and recommend its passage.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. This is a case which seems to have a surplus of loyalty in it; seldom do we get so much in any one case. [Laughter.] There is enough to serve a man for either side or both sides.

Mr. MCMILLIN. But there was not enough to satisfy the Quartermaster-General.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I make no question about the loyalty of the claimant, but I would like now to hear something about the claim itself.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. We find this claim is established by the proof. We find that this property was taken in the fall of 1862, during the year 1863, and in 1864, and was used by the United States Army. We find also that Mr. McNeal had receipts and vouchers for this property, and that the fact of the taking of it and its value are proven by more than twenty-five witnesses. In fact, there never has been any question made in the investigation of this claim about the property having been taken and used by the Army.

The only question that has been made at all has been with regard to the loyalty of Mr. McNeal, and, as suggested by my friend from Ohio [Mr. WARNER], the loyalty of Mr. McNeal is more than abundantly established; so much so that at one time Mr. McNeal was paid by the authorities of this Government $10,000 in one payment for cotton that had been taken and sold and the money gone into the hands of the authorities of the Government. And at another time his loyalty was so clearly established that he was paid by the Quartermaster-General some $1,200 for some property not included in this account.

When this claim was filed the Quartermaster-General refused to pay it because there was a question about Mr. McNeal's loyalty. The only question as shown by the evidence about his loyalty was this: Two quartermaster's agents had been down there and had examined witnesses and got up all the evidence possible with regard to Mr. McNeal's loyalty, and the evidence shows it was clearly proven; but one of the agents of the Quartermaster's Department wrote privately to the Quartermaster-General that there was a report that Mr. McNeal was disloyal.

There was no testimony to show his disloyalty. No witnesses were examined, but the Quartermaster-General then refused to open the case because there was a mass of cases standing behind this one awaiting investigation. The committee thought that was a very flimsy excuse—that the Government of the United States could not afford to do justice to one of its citizens, because a number of other citizens had had claims waiting. There was not a dissenting voice in the committee; the report was unanimous in favor of the passage of the bill. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I notice that the purpose of the proof in this case is to establish the loyalty of the claimant after the month of July, 1862, and after the Federal forces took possession of that portion of Tennessee. There is no tendency in the testimony to establish loyalty prior to that time. That seems to be entirely ignored.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman permit a suggestion?

Mr. HOLMAN. Excuse me a moment. Now, Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as this involves a principle, I have risen merely to inquire whether or no this report is the unanimous report of the Committee on War Claims, both upon the question of loyalty and in regard to the value of the property?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Yes, sir.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It is the unanimous report.

Mr. HOLMAN. The only other ground of objection to this bill that I wish to call attention to is one of which I have already spoken. That is the question of the policy of opening this large class of claims. There is a very great body of them, and undoubtedly many errors have been committed in dealing with them; but there is certainly some force in the proposition that when a tribunal has been furnished for the adjustment of such claims, and the claimants have had their day in court, the matter ought to rest there.

Mr. GEDDES. Mr. Chairman, I think I ought to say a word on this case. The action of the committee is not at all inconsistent with the policy suggested by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], but seeks to be on that line. If a claim has been fully investigated by the accounting officers, or any of the Departments, I agree with the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that we ought to be very reluctant to open up and reconsider such a case. I am not prepared, however, to say that a case might not occur where it would be entirely proper for us to do so and where we would be called upon to do so. Now, if a case can ever occur where a committee would be justified in doing that, and would be called upon to do it, this is that kind of a case. It was not investigated on its merits in the Department; it was not rejected on its merits in the Department. It was investigated and rejected, and then an opportunity was given the claimant to take additional testimony. The case was still pending, but when that additional testimony was presented and submitted the case was rejected upon the sole ground that there was not a sufficient clerical force in the Department to give the claimant a hearing and investigate the matter.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Will my colleague allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GEDDES. Certainly.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. By whom were these accounts and these vouchers examined and made up? By the accounting department, or by the committee?

Mr. GEDDES. Oh, by the accounting department; not by the committee.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Then the accounting department finds the claim correct according to the vouchers?

Mr. GEDDES. Yes. Now, Mr. Chairman, as to the question of loyalty, two very thorough investigations were made, and they resulted in favor of the claimant.

Mr. HOLMAN. After July, 1862.

Mr. GEDDES. After July, 1862. Well, Mr. Chairman, I want to be considered as occupying the position that the door of repentance is always open. I want to be considered as prepared to maintain the proposition that, if a man started out for the confederacy and saw the error of his ways, and then repented and came over to the Union side and was thereafter a thorough Union man, his original fault ought not to be charged up to him and his property taken on that account.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. If he came in in time to hurrah for the flag you would give him the appropriation? [Laughter.]

Mr. GEDDES. Yes, sir. And, Mr. Chairman, there is a principle involved. It is not a mere matter of sentiment. The Government of the United States and the Union men of the country were seeking at that time to enlist the sympathies and the judgment of the men that were engaged in the confederate cause, and particularly was that the case in the State where this claim originated, where there was such a diversity of sentiment on the Union question and where the struggles of the representatives of the Government were all directed to the point of inducing men to abandon their rebellious course and come into the Federal lines. The President's proclamation was issued not as a trick, not as a device, not as a mere unmeaning thing. It was an act full of meaning, full of principle, and full of just sentiment. Now, then, if a man obeyed that proclamation of the President, laid down his arms, took the oath of allegiance, and thereafter remained faithful to the Government of the United States, I deny our right, I deny my right, to stand up here at this late day and thrust in his face the fact that, prior to taking that oath, he had given some aid and some comfort to the rebellion.

Why, Mr. Chairman, we have a distinguished illustration on the floor of this House of the correctness of the position I now take. One of my colleagues on the Committee on War Claims started out on the confederate side, served the confederacy for a time, and, as he said in committee this morning, served it truly and loyally and with all the ability he had; but when he left the confederacy he left it for good, and he staid away; and no man has doubted his loyalty ever since, his fidelity to the Government, or the valuable services that he rendered to the Union cause.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GEDDES] to the fact that the gentleman of whom he is speaking is not in his seat.

Mr. GEDDES. I refer to Mr. SMALLS, of South Carolina. I want to say a word now in regard to the nature of the claim itself; for, even if a man were loyal, he ought not to be paid unless his property was taken. In this case there was a thorough investigation of that question. This report shows that twenty-five witnesses testified on the subject, and all but two of them with full knowledge of the facts. Let me invite the attention of the committee to the fact that Col. D. J. Benner, afterward an assistant quartermaster of the United States Army, and D. E. Coon, late colonel of the Second Iowa Cavalry, with a large number of other witnesses, testified to the facts.

The two gentlemen I have named were before the investigating committee in person, and testified to the taking of this property. It seems to me, therefore, the loyalty of the claimant is clearly established, as well as the fact that the property was taken, and its value.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass, the motion was agreed to.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIM IN NEW MEXICO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4840) to confirm a certain private land claim in the Territory of New Mexico.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman who reported this bill desires that it be passed over informally, without losing its place on the Calendar. There are several bills of a similar character coming from the Committee on Private Land Claims, which the chairman of that committee desires shall remain on the Calendar without prejudice. The committee is about to report a general bill designed to cover all these cases, and prefers that these cases should be adjudicated under the provisions of a general law.

Mr. HALSELL. In view of the fact just stated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] that the Committee on Private Land Claims is now maturing a bill of a general character which, if it should become a law, will dispose of these cases much more satisfactorily than by taking them up separately, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be laid aside informally, not to lose its place on the Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HALSELL] asks on behalf of the Committee on Private Land Claims that this bill be laid aside informally, retaining its place on the Calendar. If there be no objection that order will be made.

There was no objection.

THEODORE W. TALLMADGE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1905) for the relief of Theodore W. Tallmadge.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior of the United States be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to issue and deliver to Theodore W. Tallmadge land-scrip by which the said Theodore W. Tallmadge, or his assigns, upon the presentation thereof to the proper officers of the Land Department, shall be entitled to enter 160 acres of the surveyed public lands of the United States, not mineral or otherwise appropriated, granted to him in lieu of bounty-land warrant numbered 69651, misappropriated by an employé of the United States land office at Stevens' Point, Wis.

Mr. THOMPSON. I ask that the report in this case be read.

The report (by Mr. THOMPSON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1905) directing the Secretary of the Interior to issue and deliver to Theodore W. Tallmadge land-scrip by which he shall be entitled to enter 160 acres of the surveyed public lands of the United States, not mineral or otherwise appropriated, to be granted to him in lieu of bounty-land warrant numbered 69651, misappropriated by an employé in the United States land office at Stevens' Point, Wis., have had the same under consideration, and report that said bill ought to pass.

The committee find that bounty-land warrant No. 69651, for 160 acres of land under the act of March 3, 1855, issued July 14, 1857, to Robert A. Lockard, became the property of Theodore W. Tallmadge, and was located in his name through one George W. Stover, his agent, at the land-office at Stevens' Point, Wis., September 26, 1857, upon the southeast ¼, section 13, township 27 north, range 5 east, containing 160 acres, and a duplicate certificate of said location was then and there issued to him. The said warrant, however, was assigned in blank, that is, the name of Tallmadge was not inserted in the transfer, but a blank space was left therefor. Taking advantage of this omission, one Alexander Krembs, then a clerk in the land office at Stevens' Point, Wis., inserted his name in this blank space, so that said warrant appeared to have been duly assigned to him, and the same was located in his name at said office, May 26, 1858, on the northwest ¼, section 34, township 28, range 6, Wisconsin. A report of this last location was duly made to the General Land Office, but no report was ever made of the location made by Tallmadge. Tallmadge, on the 30th day of July, 1860, applied to the General Land Office for a patent for the land so located by him, and then learned for the first time of the subsequent location by Krembs. Tallmadge then made application for the cancellation of the Krembs entry and the restoration of the said warrant to himself, but the General Land Office refused his application, and issued a patent on the Krembs entry for the land located by Krembs. Tallmadge alleges that this was done upon the ground that Krembs had conveyed the land located by him to an innocent purchaser. Tallmadge acted in good faith in the location made by him, and received the proper and legal voucher therefor, which is still in his possession unredeemed, but has been deprived of all benefits thereof through the fraud of an employé of the land office at Stevens' Point, as before stated.

Under these circumstances we think the bill for his relief should pass.

Mr. THOMPSON. I move that this bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendatien that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIM IN NEW MEXICO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 218) to confirm a certain private land claim in the Territory of New Mexico.

Mr. SPRINGER. I understand it is the desire of the Committee on Private Land Claims that this bill be laid aside informally in the same manner as was the other bill of this character.

Mr. OSBORNE. While I was at the Land Office this morning an amendment was suggested to this bill which I think should be adopted. In order that I may have an opportunity to lay the amendment before the committee, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be laid aside informally, retaining its place on the Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and that order will be made.

LAND GRANT IN ARIZONA TERRITORY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3216) to confirm the title to that certain land grant "Tres Alamos," in Arizona Territory.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, since this bill was reported, a communication has been transmitted to the House by the Interior Department, purporting to come from persons claiming to be actual settlers upon the lands affected by the bill. After consultation with other members of the committee, I ask that the bill be laid aside informally, retaining its place on the Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

JAMES PRICE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2935) for the relief of James Price.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, authorized and directed, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to James Price, of Lewis County, Missouri, the sum of $1,000, being the amount erroneously and unlawfully collected from him on a bond and turned into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. HATCH. I ask that the report in this case be read.

The report (by Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2935) for the relief of James Price, submit the following report:

The committee have given this case due consideration, and find the following to be its history and the facts:

Some time in the spring of 1862 one William T. Morris, of Lewis County, in the State of Missouri, was arrested by the military authorities for disloyalty, and in order to secure his release from said arrest, on the 17th day of April, 1862, entered into a bond payable to the State of Missouri in the penal sum of $1,000, conditioned that he would faithfully keep the conditions of an oath of allegiance that day taken, a copy of which was attached to said bond and became a part thereof, the said James Price and one S. B. Harment becoming sureties thereon.

That some time in October, 1862, after the execution of said bond, the said William T. Morris, the principal therein, left said county of Lewis.

That in May, 1863, a military commission for the said county of Lewis took a forfeiture of said bond upon the evidence of three witnesses, two of whom swear to rumors and one swears to having seen him with a squad of rebel soldiers in July or August, 1862, and upon this evidence the said commission demanded the payment of said bond, and under threats demanded payment of the same by the sureties thereon; whereupon, on the said 14th day of May, 1863, the said James Price, as one of said sureties, paid to one William Odor, provost-marshal and chief of said military commission, the sum of $1,000 in satisfaction of said bond, which was duly receipted for by him. The transcript of said proceedings furnished by the Adjutant-General of the Army shows that said sum of $1,000 so collected was duly accounted for to the United States Government by said Odor, and has been held by the Government ever since.

The claimant shows by his own affidavit that at the time of said forfeiture and payment he protested with said commission that said Morris had never violated the condition of said bond, and asked for time to find the whereabouts of said Morris, which was refused. He shows by the affidavit of said Morris that he never violated the conditions of said bond; that he remained in said county of Lewis until the last of October, 1862, when he went into the State of Illinois to work, and denies being in any rebel service after the execution of said bond; that he staid in the State of Illinois until the last of March, 1863; from there he went to the State of Iowa, and in April of that year he started overland with some friends to the State of California, arriving there about the 5th day of August, 1863, and continued to reside in said State until 1871, when he returned to the State of Missouri. All of said evidence is corroborated by witnesses, who swear they were with him at the times and places as specified in his said affidavit.

One William Locket swears that during said year 1862, between the last of April and the last of September, he worked with said Morris and slept with him every night, and that he was not away from home during that time.

One D. F. Stafles swears that said Morris worked for him, in said county of Lewis, from some time in April, 1862, to September, 1863, and was there all the time. If there is any reliance to be placed in human evidence, the said Morris was in said county of Lewis all the time from April, 1862, to September that year, and was working there during that time, and was not with said squad of rebel soldiers testified to. The committee concluded from all the evidence that the said witness who testified to having seen said Morris with a squad of rebels was mistaken in the person he saw. That is the most charitable view to put on it. The committee are of the opinion that said claim is just, and recommend that the bill do pass.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I move that this bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

ESTATE OF JOEL C. FRAZIER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 898) for the relief of the estate of Joel C. Frazier, deceased.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $3,684.10 to Henry Williams, administrator de bonis non of the estate of Joel C. Frazier, deceased, late of Harrison County, Kentucky, the same being for quartermaster's stores, consisting of horses, corn, wood, &c., taken from the said Frazier by the military forces of the United States.

The amendments reported by the committee were read, as follows:

In lines 5, 6, and 7 strike out the words "three thousand six hundred and eighty-four dollars and ten cents to Henry Williams" and insert "$1,908 to Caleb W. West."

In line 10 strike out the word "corn."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I ask that the report in this case be read or that some explanation be given.

The CHAIRMAN. The report will be read.

The report (by Mr. STONE, of Kentucky) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 898) for the relief of the estate of Joel C. Frazier, deceased, submit the following report:

The committee find the facts to be as stated in House Report No. 1240, Forty-sixth Congress, second session, which report is hereto annexed and made a part of this report, and is as follows:

Dr. Joel C. Frazier, for many years prior to 1862, and afterward till the date of his death, in May, 1863, owned a farm of about 600 acres, just outside of the limits of the town of Cynthiana, Ky.

In January, 1862, J. J. Landrum, a lieutenant-colonel, then commanding the Eighteenth Regiment Kentucky Volunteers, took from the said Frazier 56 cords of wood, for the use of the troops under his command, of the value of $2.75 per cord, and became indebted for hauling in the sum of $4, making $158.

He executed a voucher for these items on behalf of the State of Kentucky, for the reason that his regiment had not then been mustered into the service of the United States, and for these items the claim is made for $158 against the United States.

Colonel Landrum also occupied a house on said farm for a hospital from February 20 to July 17, 1862, the use of which was reasonably worth the sum of $60. He also occupied as an encampment 15 acres of land on said farm for the same period, worth $15 per month, making $75.

General Ben. P. Runkle, commanding the Forty-fifth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, encamped on said farm about the 25th of July, 1862, and occupied 15 acres of land for his encampment from that time to September 2, 1862, and the value of that occupation was $18.50.

During his occupation the soldiers under Runkle's command used corn from a 27-acre field on said farm, both for themselves and horses, and in September, 1862, at the approach of the rebel forces under Kirby Smith, cut down all that remained of said corn, to enable them better to see the approach of the enemy.

How much of this corn was used by the soldiers, how much for the food for the cavalry horses, and how much was cut down and left to rot, is a mere matter of conjecture. The evidence leaves the question entirely unsettled. To suggest amounts would be simply a guess.

On the 14th day of June, 1864, General S. G. Burbridge, after a battle with the rebel General John H. Morgan, in which he lost a part of his cavalry horses, took from the farm of Dr. Frazier, then deceased, fourteen horses belonging to the assets of his estate, of the average value of at least $125 each.

For these items Nancy Frazier, the widow and executrix of the last will of Joel C. Frazier, in 1871 filed her claim with the Quartermaster-General, asking to recover from the United States, as follows:

For 56 cords of wood, $2.75 per cord	$154 00
Hauling 7 loads of wood	4 00
Rent of house, 6 rooms, for hospital	117 60
Rent of 15 acres blue-grass	70 00
Rent of 15 acres blue-grass, for encampment	18 50
1,350 bushels of corn, 80 cents	1,080 00
7 horses, at $160 each	1,120 00
2 gray horses, $160 each	320 00
2 sorrel horses, $160 each	320 00
2 brown horses, $160 each	320 00
1 roan horse, $160	160 00
Total	3,684 10

The said Dr. Frazier died testate, and by his last will and testament devised and directed: First. That after payment of his just debts his land and slaves should go to his wife during her natural life, "with full power to do everything with them in according to her viewers, with the exception of their sale." Second. With the exception of ten head of horses and fifteen of cattle, to be selected from his stock by his wife, he ordered the sale of all his horses and cattle. Third. He bequeathed to his wife his carriage and such pair of horses as she should select in addition to the ten above named, &c., and directed that the hogs and sheep remain on the farm and all farming utensils more than was needed to be sold. Fourth. He bequeathed to Susan Redmon $3,000, to be paid out of the proceeds of the estate at his wife's decease. Fifth. After the death of his wife, he "ordained" that all of his estate not otherwise "ordered" be jointly devised among the three children of his son Hubbard W. Frazier, deceased, "the forms of law to govern in the distribution," and he nominated his wife executrix of his will.

Said will was duly proved and admitted to probate, and the widow accepted the trust and administered the estate until her death, in 1872, when Henry Williams was appointed and qualified as the administrator de bonis non of Dr. Frazier's estate.

Dr. Frazier was undoubtedly loyal, all admit that, and it is conceded his wife was as unmistakably disloyal.

The three grandchildren named in the will were minors at the death of Dr. Joel C. Frazier, their ages being at that time twelve, nine, and seven, respectively.

This case was exhaustively examined on the facts by the Quartermaster-General and the Third Auditor of the Treasury prior to January 31, 1874. A special agent of the Department made two examinations and reports; a large volume of testimony was taken, comprising over one hundred pages of closely written matter

On the first examination and report the Quartermaster allowed:

For rent of house five months	$60 00
For rent of 15 acres of land five months	75 00
Making	135 00

He declined to allow for the wood, $158, because when taken the troops for whose use it was taken were not mustered into the service of the United States, and therefore the wood was not strictly quartermaster stores; but he did decide it was a proper claim against the Adjutant-General's Office. He declined to allow anything for the corn claimed to have been taken by Colonel Runkle's men. He further decided that the horses, under the circumstances when taken, belonged to Mrs. Frazer, under her husband's will, and as her loyalty was unproved, nothing would be paid on account of the horses.

After this determination, the report was recalled by Acting Quartermaster-General Ingalls, and a large amount of additional evidence was taken, but on consideration, January 24, 1878, Quartermaster-General Meigs declined to reopen the case or change his conclusion, and then the same was referred to Congress and a bill presented for the relief of Dr. Frazier's estate.

The committee are unwilling to review the facts found by the Quartermaster-General. While the committee think that the evidence tends strongly to prove that a considerable amount of corn was used by Runkle's command for the use of the horses therein, they will not disturb his finding, especially as the amount taken would be simply a conjecture, but they think the wood and hauling should be paid for, as no one disputes it, except it is determined that it should have been paid by the Adjutant-General's Office instead of the Quartermaster's Department.

Has a proper conclusion been arrived at, as a matter of law, touching the horses for which the claim was made? At the time Dr. Frazier died there were on his plantation about thirty head of horses. These horses were assets of the estate; twelve might become the sole property of Mrs. Frazier by her selection. No suggestion is made and no proof is offered that Mrs. Frazier ever did select any of the fourteen horses as her own that were taken by Burbridge's command. On the contrary, it shows she selected other animals under the will as her own, and of these she gave a part to her friends and a part remained on the farm, and at her death were treated as assets of her estate. These fourteen horses, when taken for the use of the Army, were simply assets of the estate of

Dr. Frazier, held by the administratrix in trust, to be sold and the proceeds to go to pay debts, the $3,000 legacy, and the remainder to the minor grandchildren as residuary legatees. The title of Mrs. Frazier was simply in her representative capacity, and it was unimportant whether she was loyal or disloyal. Her conceded disloyalty could not defeat the claim.

Your committee therefore recommend that the items of said account be allowed as follows:

For 56 cords of wood, at $2.75 per cord	$154 00
Hauling 7 loads of wood	4 00
14 horses, at $125 per head	1,750 00
Total	1,908 00

Although favorably passed upon by the Quartermaster-General, we are unwilling to allow the claims for the use and occupation of the house for a hospital or the blue-grass lot for a camping ground. If they are already allowed, as it seems to us they are, we need not audit them again; and if they are not, we do not think on principle they should be paid. Their occupation was but an incident to necessary armed occupation of that part of the country for the general good. It was a military necessity.

The committee therefore recommend that the bill be amended by striking out the words "three thousand six hundred and eighty-four dollars and ten cents," in lines 5 and 6, and inserting in lieu thereof the words "one thousand nine hundred and eight dollars," and also by striking out the words "Henry Williams," in line 6, and inserting in lieu thereof the words "Caleb W. West," and as thus amended we recommend the passage of the bill, the amendments being indicated in the accompanying bill.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I move that this bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. HOLMAN. Inasmuch as this case has been examined, as stated in the report, by the Quartermaster-General and the Third Auditor of the Treasury, I make no objection to the passage of the bill; but I ask my friend from Kentucky whether he would object to inserting in the bill the words "which shall be received in full of all demands of said estate against the United States."

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. There is no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The motion of Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, was agreed to; and the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS IN ARIZONA TERRITORY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3235) to confirm title to certain land claims in Arizona Territory.

Mr. HALSELL. This bill belongs to the class of cases to which I referred when last on the floor. I ask unanimous consent that it be laid aside informally, retaining its place on the Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

J. D. MORRISON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5187) for the relief of J. D. Morrison, surviving partner of C. M. & J. D. Morrison.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $408.10 to J. D. Morrison, surviving partner of C. M. & J. D. Morrison, of Rockbridge County, Virginia, being the excess of taxes improperly collected by them, by duplicate assessment, for whisky distilled by them in January, 1866.

Mr. TUCKER. I move the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass. The report of the committee is quite a long one, and without asking for its reading I will merely state, in order to save the time of the House, that this bill has been before Congress for a good many sessions—indeed, ever since I came here as a member of Congress, now a good long while ago.

It passed the House in the Forty-seventh Congress unanimously, but failed in the Senate for want of time. It passed the Senate in the Forty-eighth Congress, but failed in this House for want of time.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Was that the case we adjourned on?

Mr. TUCKER. Yes; the session died when I stood in this place begging the House to consider this bill. It returns an amount of $408 of taxes illegally exacted just twenty years ago. The Government has already made enough in the shape of interest to pay the principal; and now all we ask is the repayment of the principal.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. LIZZIE D. CLARKE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 958) for the relief of Mrs. Lizzie D. Clarke.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Mrs. Lizzie D. Clarke, widow in community of Thomas L. Clarke, deceased, late of New Orleans, tutrix of his minor child and administratrix of his estate, the sum of $60,000, for the loss of the steamboat Belle, said steamboat being the property of said Thomas L. Clarke, and lost on the Rio Grande River while under lease by the Government of the United States under contract with the owner, the said Thomas L. Clarke.

Mr. TUCKER. That bill also has been passed in the Senate and is now before the House, and on the Private Calendar. The case was referred to the Committee on Claims of this House and that committee has reported upon it favorably and with unanimity. At the proper time I will ask that the House bill be reported to the House with the recommendation that it be laid upon the table, and then that the Senate bill be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the report be read in the first instance.

The report (by Mr. TUCKER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill H. R. 958, respectfully report:

The facts in the case are well ascertained by the record in the case of Thomas L. Clarke vs. United States, in the Court of Claims (10 Ct. of C. Cases, 604), and in the same case in 95 U. S. Sup. Ct. Rep., 539. The depositions of a number of witnesses, among whom is Maj. O. O. Potter, quartermaster, United States Army, with whom the contract was made, are in the record, and the papers from the Third Auditor's Office of the Treasury Department have been laid before the committee.

The facts deduced from this evidence are these:

In September, 1865, just after the close of the civil war between the States, and before the confusion incident to a state of war had subsided, at a time when the Government by its armies was attempting to restore order and to suppress any straggling forces which might still be in hostility to the Government, Brigadier-General Steele was in command of the United States forces at Brownsville, on the Rio Grande, in the State of Texas. It was important in his view to carry military stores and other supplies from Brownsville up that river to Ringgold Barracks. He had no transportation at hand by land or water.

In the Mexican waters and on the Mexican side of the river at Matamoros there was a steamer called the Belle, in the hands of, and belonging to, Thomas L. Clarke. Maj. O. O. Potter, quartermaster of the Army, was sent to Matamoros to procure this steamer for Government use in conveying stores to the Ringgold Barracks. Being in Mexican waters she could not be seized or impressed into service; and Major Potter, quartermaster, under the authority of General Steele made a verbal contract with Mr. Clarke, the owner, by which it was agreed to pay $150 per day for hire, and to pay for her loss, if such event should occur upon her trial trip to Ringgold Barracks; with the further understanding, that if she should be found to be suitable for the service, a written contract would be made for her future use. It further appears there was no other vessel on the river within our territory which could be procured.

There was no mode of insuring the vessel at that time and in that quarter, and the owner relied upon the contract of the Government, through its quartermaster, to pay for her if lost on the trip.

Upon these terms the Belle was delivered to the officer, brought to Brownsville, loaded, manned by the Government, and started on her trip. It appears that she was very heavily loaded, and that in making a turn in the river she ran against its bank, was snagged, and sunk, a complete loss, in 30 feet of water, and then drifted down-stream, and was buried in a sand-bank.

The owner made claim for hire and loss of vessel to the Department; then by petition to the Court of Claims, where it was dismissed, and then appealed to the Supreme Court.

That court decided that under the act of June 2, 1862 (12 Stat., 411) the contract was invalid because not in writing, but that as the contract had been executed by the claimant, in the delivery of his vessel for public use, a recovery for the hire on a quantum meruit should be allowed, and at the price agreed upon, but that there could be no recovery for the loss. From the judgment of the court there was a dissent by three justices, Miller, Field, and Hunt, through a strong opinion by Mr. Justice Miller, who held the statute prescribing the need of a written contract to be directory, not mandatory. There is nothing in the opinion of the court, or in the dissenting opinion, which indicates any thought in the mind of the court that the contract against loss was ultra vires, or that it would have been invalid if it had been in writing. Nor did counsel for the Government seem to have raised this point. The inference from the emphasis laid on the fact the contract was not in writing would rather be that it would have availed the claimant, had it been written, to recover for the loss.

The court, however, had done justice to the claimant as to the hire upon an implication of a contract to pay hire, because the verbal contract had been executed on his part. And had the loss occurred from carelessness, it would seem from the language of the court he would have received its value. But as there was no proof of carelessness there was no ground to recover for the loss on a contract held to be invalid.

Under these circumstances, the decision being made in 1877-'78, the claimant appeals to Congress on the ground that, though the unwritten contract be technically invalid, as the promise to insure the owner against loss was the inducement held out in Mexican waters to bring the Belle into the hands of the Government, it is not just for the Government to avoid the liability for loss on this technical plea (and a doubtful one until by a divided court it was decided to be valid). It would be a fraud on the owner to offer inducement to get possession of the Belle, and then to repudiate it without notice to the owner of the invalidity of the contract because it was not made in writing.

Your committee feel the full force of this argument. Good faith in transactions between man and man would condemn such a plea after such inducement, and courts of equity have never permitted the statute of frauds to be used as a defense when the defense would work a fraud. The highest good faith should mark the conduct of a government to its citizens; and while its courts may be constrained to decide against a claim because based on a contract void for some technical defect, yet when the appeal is made to the supreme authority it behooves the Government to do justice to the party in like manner as if the contract had been formal and valid.

Your committee thought it best, however, to inquire of the War Department whether under the law and regulations of the Army the contract in question would have been held binding had it been in writing. The question and full answers of the Quartermaster-General are hereto appended marked A.

By this answer it appears that the only limit to the power of a quartermaster or other officer to contract for means of transportation and other supplies, especially in time of war, is the public necessity; that in this case it was great and pressing; that in like cases the present Quartermaster-General while quartermaster on this very river had purchased vessels and the accounts for their value had been passed by the Treasury. If a contract to buy the Belle would have been valid it follows a fortiori that a contract of hire with a promise to pay for hire if lost during the service would be valid.

Your committee on the facts therefore think the Government is in justice bound to pay for the value of the vessel; that was assessed at $60,000. Major Potter thinks that is fair. No intimation appears it is not. It is certified as proved by the Court of Claims.

This bill was favorably reported by this committee and a committee of the Senate in the Forty-eighth Congress; and the committee of the Senate at this session have again reported it favorably. Your committee add an extract from the last Senate report, stating a new ground for a favorable report in the case:

"In addition to what is said in the foregoing report and communication from the Quartermaster-General, the contract made between the owner of the steamer Belle and the quartermaster, as above set forth, may be recognized as coming fairly within the exception as to written contracts promulgated in Army Regulations, paragraph 1048, which is in the precise language of the act of March, 1861 (12 Stat. at L., page 220), and provides as follows:

"'When immediate delivery or performance is required by the public exigency, the article or service required may be procured, by open purchase or contract, at the place and in the mode in which such articles are usually bought and sold or such services engaged between individuals.'

"In the present case 'the public exigency' for the use of the boat exi-ted. The officer in command of the department directs his quartermaster to contract for its immediate employment, which was done, and the boat passed into the possession and service of the Government, with the express agreement that if lost in that service the owner should be paid her value. The question of the Government's legal liability to make good that loss was decided by a divided court against the owner because the contract was not in writing, but that does not meet either the merits of the claim or the measure of the Government's just obligation. The boat is shown to have been worth, at time of loss, the sum of $60,000."

Your committee report back the accompanying bill, and recommend that it do pass.

A.

QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., February 16, 1885.

SIR: I have the honor to reply to your inquiry of February 11, 1885, in the matter of the claim of Thomas L. Clarke for the steamer Belle, as hereinafter written, viz:

Question 1. "Under the law and regulations of the Department had a quartermaster authority, with the orders of the general commanding in the field or at a station, or as matters were in 1865 (September) on the Rio Grande, to make a contract in writing such as Major Potter did with Thomas L. Clarke, binding the Government to be responsible for the loss of the vessel; or to make such contract orally?

"If it had been in writing under the act of Congress referred to in the report of the case in 95 United States Reports would it have been held valid, and would the War Department have paid the claim for the loss?"

Answer. The district of the Rio Grande was under the command of Maj. Gen. Fred. Steele, United States Volunteers, and his chief quartermaster was Maj. O. O. Potter, quartermaster, volunteers. A large military force of cavalry had already arrived upon the Upper Rio Grande, or was expected from Shreveport, La., marching across Texas to San Antonio and throwing out sufficient forces to take possession of the frontier from Ringgold Barracks to Fort Duncan, near Eagle Pass. These troops had to be supplied by way of the Gulf to Brazos Santiago, and thence by boat to Brownsville and to Ringgold Barracks.

The navigation of the Rio Grande is at all times difficult and dangerous, and in time of war doubly so, owing to the narrowness of the stream and the bushy character of the growth on its banks. It has a shifting channel, and means of concealing guerrillas and bushwhackers generally along its course to Ringgold. General Steele had instructions to supply the troops up the river. Boats to navigate the river have usually been built heretofore specially for that purpose, drawing (loaded) about 3 feet of water.

General Steele appears to have found such a boat in Matamoras, under the Mexican flag. A boat thus situated, at such a time of war and difficulty of replacement, was of the greatest value to the owner. Naturally the owner would decline to let the boat go out of his hands without full guarantee and insurance as to her safety and return to his possession. No other insurance for such navigation was possible, except that of the Government. The vessel was obtained and manned, loaded and dispatched to Ringgold, under a bargain allowing a reasonable rate per day, thus showing that the owner did not cover his risk by exaggerated rates, but by exacting a promise that if lost she should be paid for on certain terms agreed upon. In my opinion the two officers operating in that district, with the authority and responsibility devolving upon them, were justified in the course they took, and were actually compelled by their duty to promise what they did if the boat could be secured in no other way. The law is mostly silent in war except the law of good faith. The regulations do not provide for emergencies, and this was a tremendous one. If this case were in exact conformity to all the forms applicable in peace, it never would have reached the Halls of Congress.

As to precedents: In 1863 on the arrival of the expedition to the Rio Grande at Fort Brown three steamers were found under the Mexican flag tied up at Matamoras, on the Mexican side of the river, in precisely similar circumstances; they were obtained by the present writer under the orders of the military commander present on a verbal promise of the payment for their full value; they were delivered over for immediate service, manned and wooded, and the money for their purchase was duly paid subsequently in New Orleans, and the accounts were passed at the Treasury. Operations without these boats would have been impossible on that river; so it was with the steamer Belle, belonging to Mr. Clarke. I do not wish to argue this case, but it is apparent to me that the owner would not regard the question of fault or no fault in the loss of the steamer. She was in other hands than his own and she was actually lost, and that fact was conceded; if lost by negligence, act of the enemy, or any other cause, the owner was to be paid for his boat precisely the same. It seems strange that it is legal to recognize the verbal agreement in just so far as the few days' hire is concerned and repudiate the rest of the agreement as concerns the loss of the boat. The penny is paid and the pound denied. I look upon this case as one of purely good faith under the pressure of war, and, therefore, as overriding all ordinary precedents and rules.

In my judgment Major Potter and his commander had full and sufficient authority to do what they did do; that is, to do all that was needful and necessary to carry out their instructions as to the military operations depending upon themselves in any practicable or possible way by hiring anything out of their reach that could not be impressed and by impressing any means of conveyance at hand. This was true, whether the matter of agreement was reduced to writing or (time not admitting) leaving it in verbal form, so that it was fully and fairly understood by the parties thereto. Now, it was so far well understood that the property was transferred from the owner, and moved from the Mexican side of the river to the Texas side, and placed in the hands of our officers. Clarke executed his part of the agreement, and the Government, in my judgment, should do its part. There were no telegraph lines in 1865, and no other swift means of communication between the Government and its forces on the Rio Grande. All the intermediate country between Washington city and the Rio Grande was boiling with war, and covered with resulting confusion. The officers responsible for conducting operations on that remote frontier had to stand alone and act as best they might in order to secure success and avoid failure. The responsibilities of such a period can be but imperfectly passed upon in the light of the happy peace that rests upon this great capital to-day.

In conclusion, to my mind the reduction of this agreement to writing would not have changed materially its binding force. It was absolutely impracticable in the nature of things to conform to the statute of 1862, cited in proceedings of the Court of Claims in this case.

Most respectfully, your obedient servant,

S. B. HOLABIRD,
Quartermaster-General, U. S. A.

Hon. J. RANDOLPH TUCKER,
Chairman Judiciary Committee, House of Representatives.

Mr. TUCKER. I now ask that Senate bill 32, for the relief of Mrs. Lizzie D. Clarke, of New Orleans, to be taken up, in order that it may be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise for the purpose of asking a question rather than to discuss the pending bill. Of course I have no objection, if the committee acts upon the matter favorably, to allow the Senate bill to be passed instead of the House bill. There is one feature of this case which seems to be worthy of at least a moment's attention. In the statement of the case by the committee the following passage occurs:

The court, however, had done justice to the claimant as to the hire upon an implication of a contract to pay hire, because the verbal contract had been executed on his part. And had the loss occurred from carelessness, it would seem from the language of the court he would have received its value. But as there was no proof of carelessness, there was no ground to recover for the loss on a contract held to be invalid.

Upon the whole case it is quite clear the Government ought to treat this as a valid contract. The Government having obtained control of this vessel by parol agreement, the only one which could be made, the vessel being at the time outside of our jurisdiction, Congress would no doubt be authorized in view of the decision of the Supreme Court to do exactly what justice demands. I do not know to what extent the judgment of the Supreme Court made reparation for the value of this property. I understand there was recovery as to the hire of the vessel.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. For a few days only.

Mr. CASWELL. Twelve hundred dollars for eight days.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the amount were considerable I should insist, as a matter of justice on the part of the Government to the claimant and to itself, that the amount so paid ought to be considered as part payment in discharge of the contract. There were a great many of these contracts entered into during the war with the Government, and the Government having paid the entire war risk, amounting in some cases to a considerable sum, where the amount is large the amount paid should be deducted from the amount allowed. This contract having been only for a few days, I do not object.

Mr. TUCKER. My friend from Indiana broadly concedes the propriety of the bill. I will not detain the House further than to state that this case has been favorably reported by the committees of the two Houses at the last and present Congresses. I move that the bill (S. 32) for the relief of Mrs. Lizzie D. Clarke, of New Orleans, be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the bill be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Mrs. Lizzie D. Clarke, widow in community of Thomas L. Clarke, deceased, late of New Orleans, tutrix of his minor child and administratrix of his estate, the sum of $60,000, for the loss of the steamboat Belle, said steamboat being the property of said Thomas L. Clarke and lost on the Rio Grande River while under lease by the Government of the United States under contract with the owner, the said Thomas L. Clarke.

Mr. TUCKER'S motion was agreed to; and the Senate bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill (H. R. 958) for the relief of Mrs. Lizzie D. Clarke will be reported to the House with the recommendation that it be laid upon the table.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

FRANCIS H. SHAW.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2995) for the relief of Francis H. Shaw.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to grant to Francis H. Shaw, late captain of Company C, Fifty-fifth Illinois United States Volunteer Infantry, an honorable discharge and muster-out of the service of the United States.

SEC. 2. That nothing in this act contained shall be held to authorize the payment of any money to said Francis H. Shaw on account of the honorable discharge and muster-out as hereinbefore provided.

Mr. LAIRD. Mr. Chairman, I reported this bill, and, as is apparent, nothing is asked from the Government by Captain Shaw except an honorable discharge. He was dismissed from the service of the United States peremptorily, without trial by court-martial, without investigation, by the general commanding the army, without a hearing, and in the face of the fact that a vast preponderance of testimony shows that Captain Shaw was without blame.

The facts were that this officer, in command of the Fifty-fifth Illinois Volunteers when the operations in and about Atlanta, Ga., were going on, had held this regiment as skirmishers in an advanced and exposed position where the men had been under fire for seventy-two hours, and without food, without water, at which time he received an order from Lieutenant Martin, of the staff, to advance in company with the Fifty-seventh Ohio Volunteers.

Captain Shaw replied that under the circumstances, in the condition in which his men were at the time, he did not feel that he ought to order his regiment forward until the general commanding his brigade was advised as to the condition of his troops. The object of the order was that he should take and hold a still more advanced position in the line, requiring of necessity men who were alert and upon their guard and not worn out by excessive service. He asked, therefore, that the order, or rather that the execution of the order by himself, should be suspended until the officer in command of the brigade should be advised of these circumstances. This request of his, for the suspenson of the execution of the order until the general in immediate command should be advised of the condition, was reported by Lieutenant Martin of the staff back to the brigade commander as a peremptory refusal on the part of Captain Shaw to take his regiment into action. This report of the lieutenant of the staff was transmitted to the officer commanding the brigade, by him to the division commander, and through him to General Howard, commanding the Army, and became the basis of the summary dismissal of Captain Shaw from the service of the United States, such dismissal being without a day in court being allowed to the accused. He had positively no hearing whatever.

While the committee recognized that the exigencies of the service might have denied to Captain Shaw at that time a trial by court-martial, they also recognize the fact that the exigencies of justice and fair dealing demanded that he should not have been summarily dismissed from the service of the Government without at least a hearing before the officer commanding the department, and who assumed the authority to dismiss this officer.

This, I believe, is in brief a fair statement of the facts of the case, and I now yield so much time as he may desire to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT].

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, this bill provides, as my friend on the committee from Nebraska [Mr. LAIRD] has just explained, for the honorable dismissal of an officer who was dishonorably dismissed without a hearing after four years of——

Mr. STEELE. It provides for the restoration.

Mr. HITT. Yes; for the honorable discharge and muster-out of an officer who was dishonorably dismissed without a hearing after four years of faithful, brave, efficient service without a blemish upon his character as a soldier and as a man from the day when he enlisted as a private until he had risen by sheer merit to the command of the regiment. In the language of his associate officers, fifty of them signing it, at the very time of this unjust, abrupt dismissal he was ever considered "a first-class commander, sharing with his regiment, once proud and strong, all the hardship which reduced it to a fragment." In that very hour of his dismissal the officers and soldiers who were eye-witnesses gave their testimony of his noble character and conduct and their protest against this wrong. They knew and declared that he had never disobeyed orders nor deserved this cruel, arbitrary blow, ending his career as a soldier; and if their voices had reached President Lincoln, to whom their petition was addressed, he would have been restored to them and to honor.

The facts in this sad case which my friend from Nebraska has just stated have been pressed upon me again and again by the affectionate remembrance and intense regard of the soldiers who served with Captain Shaw, who were in the regiment which he commanded at that time, who cherish his memory to this hour with a kind of religious affection, following up his cause with unwearied zeal in order that justice may be done him at last. But it was not so much for the purpose of restating the facts which have been just given that I have risen, as to explain the cause of this long delay, now over twenty years, which may in the minds of some members tend to prejudice this bill.

When this officer was so harshly dismissed, conscious that he had done all a soldier's duty, stung with a sense of wrong done him, he turned away and went silently home, refusing utterly to say one word even in protest. His brother officers unanimously signed a paper stating the facts and appealing for redress to President Lincoln, but Mr. Lincoln, it is now discovered, never saw that paper. In the tumult and confusion of the terrible struggle around Atlanta it never reached the President of the United States. Captain Shaw went home with a wounded spirit, strong in the verdict of his own conscience, and determined that he would abide by the result of time and the final judgments of men. Years went by and he gave no sign, nor would he suffer others to plead in his name. But his comrades of the old Fifty-fifth made persistent application to him to be permitted to urge his cause, until finally in 1884 his consent was obtained, and an appeal was sent to me to be presented to Congress for his relief.

In giving his consent to their action in making this effort for his sake Captain Shaw said, in words worthy a brave soldier, sorely hurt by this cruel wound harder to bear than the wounds he received on the field of Shiloh:

Should the efforts of my comrades in arms to correct what they have always considered a grievous injustice be successful I shall rejoice, and especially for my children's sake; if my unintentional misdemeanor is judged worthy lifelong punishment, I must continue to suffer in silence, as I have done so many years. My conscience has never accused me of any unfaithfulness to my country; never of any breach of military law. I have always believed myself unjustly dealt with in consequence of a misunderstanding of the facts in the case.

This patriotic man, who was engaged in a lucrative business when the war broke out, left it to go into the service of his country as a private soldier. He took part in nine important battles, and displayed such high soldierly qualities, courage, coolness, modesty, efficiency, as raised him from the ranks—from the position of a private soldier—up to the command of the regiment. The ground upon which he was dismissed, the alleged refusal to take his troops into action under an order, was manifestly a mistake, a misunderstanding, for there is the testimony of two brother officers, who were present and saw what took place when the order was given, and they heard his reply. Their testimony shows that his words did not indicate that he acted in a spirit of disobedience; and he himself states he had no idea that he had committed the heinous offense of disobeying his superior officer. His command was utterly exhausted by the long-continued fighting before Atlanta.

On that 4th of August, 1864, they had been without sleep for three nights and four days, under a murderous and destructive fire; they were holding an exposed point far in advance of our line and within three hundred yards of the enemy in his entrenchments, an enfilading fire on their right flank, with less than twenty rounds of ammunition remaining. Then came the aid-de-camp of General Lightburn and ordered him to advance across a ravine to a hill beyond. He replied by calling the young officer's attention to the desperate condition of the men, and asking that the general be made to know it before they were pushed on to a position where the safety of the whole line would depend on their vigilance. At that moment the men were watching each other to prevent men from falling to the ground asleep in the utter and last exhaustion of nature. In the new position to which he was ordered to lead them they would, had they captured it, have been compelled to lie down on their faces or be swept off by the enemy's fire. Captain Shaw, not thinking of disobedience, said he wanted his commander to know the condition of his men, which made the execution of that order impossible. Colonel Mott says after he and Lieutenant Martin had heard Captain Shaw, the aid-de-camp, Lieutenant Martin, said: "I will report the matter, and you await further orders." Captain Shaw had no thought of disobedience, and neither then nor at any other time did his courage falter. But the young officer was irritated, made a report that was probably not just to Captain Shaw, and the general in haste condemned him. Without warning or trial he was dismissed. There was no time for a court-martial in the tremendous strife then at its height around Atlanta. The protest of his comrades to the President was unheard; and the injustice thus hastily done has been silently borne by this uncomplaining hero through all these years. Is it surprising that his comrades of the old Fifty-fifth Illinois at their annual reunions always rise to do honor to his wounded name, and repeat the story of their love for their old commander and their indignation at this continuing wrong? In the last Congress I introduced this bill, and the committee, after careful examination, recommended that it pass; but it was crowded over and failed, with thousands of other bills that never reached a vote. Again the Committee on Military Affairs has recommended it to this Congress, and I trust that the House will to-day vote to blot out this false record and place this soldier before the world stainless as he stood on the morning of August, 1864, at the head of his haggard heroes.

Mr. LAIRD. I move that the bill be laid aside and reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

COL. HENRY J. HUNT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 37) to change the rank of an officer on the retired-list of the Army, reported from the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized to select from among the colonels now on the retired-list of the Army of the United States one person who has served in the late civil war as chief of artillery of one of the principal armies of the United States, and to place him on said retired-list with the rank and pay of major-general from the date of his retirement: Provided, That the officer so selected has been borne on the active-list of the Army for more than forty years as a commissioned officer of artillery: And provided further, That he held at the date of his retirement the brevet rank of major-general, conferred by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, for distinguished services in said war.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 37) to authorize the President to change the rank of officers on the retired-list of the Army, having considered the same, beg leave to submit the following report:

We find that the only officer of the Army who can be affected by the bill is Col. and Bvt. Maj. Gen. Henry J. Hunt.

We find that a bill was introduced in the Forty-eighth Congress to attain the same object; that it was favorably reported by the Committee on Military Affairs of both the Senate and House, and that it passed the House of Representatives by more than a two-thirds vote.

The committee adopt the report of the Committee on Military Affairs of the Forty-eighth Congress, which we incorporate and make a part of this report, and report back the bill with a recommendation that it do pass.

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 78) to provide for the retirement of Col. Henry J. Hunt as a major-general of the United States Army, beg leave to report:

Colonel Hunt's active service with troops, as shown by the official record hereto appended (Appendix A), has extended over a period of more than forty-four years. He has held the rank of major-general by two brevets, one in the volunteer and one in the regular service. He performed the duties of major-general for nearly eight years, of which four were during the late war. For three years he was chief of artillery of the Army of the Potomac, and successfully conducted this important and difficult service. It never has been questioned that his conduct met the approbation of the successive commanders of that army and of General Grant. His brevet of major-general of volunteers

"for gallantry and distinguished conduct at the battle of Gettysburg, and for faithful and highly meritorious services from the Rapidan to Petersburg," antedated all brevets of the same grade conferred at the close of that campaign, and Major-General Meade subsequently recommended his promotion to a full major-general. Although his command was equal in extent to that of an army corps, he is, so far as known, the only permanent corps commander who did not receive the rank of full major-general. This rose from the fact that in his arm of the service (the artillery) there was no such promotion as in the other arms.

The Adjutant-General, in the first year of the war, held that a battery was a company, and as the law authorizes not more than one brigadier-general for every four regiments (40 companies), the largest army could have no more than one brigadier of artillery.

On the other hand, the General-in-Chief, in the second year of the war, held that each battery was a regiment commanded by a captain, and that consequently field officers were unnecessary, and orders were issued to exclude them from the service. (General Orders No. 126, 1-62.)

For the remainder of the war both theories were acted on. The artillery was deprived of generals because a battery was a company, and of field officers because a battery was a regiment.

The result was the immediate stoppage of promotion in the artillery. Consequently, as soon as an artillery officer developed high ability he was offered the promotion in other arms that was impossible in his own. In this way the other surviving commanders of batteries in the Mexican war, George H. Thomas, John F. Reynolds, and W. T. Sherman, were in 1861 appointed brigadier-generals of infantry, and rose to great distinction. General Hunt was repeatedly offered such commands; but because his skill and experience as an artillerist were essential to the success of his arm, the Government would not permit him to leave it. Thus, his very ability prevented his advancement by confining him to the artillery, where there was little or no promotion.

While receiving the pay of a colonel, or at most of a brigadier-general, Colonel Hunt was subject to all the expenses of a major-general commanding a corps. His command being scattered over a great extent of ground, many of his officers, riding long distances to confer with him, had to be kept over night and entertained. Moreover, many foreign officers and other guests at the headquarters of the Army, were billeted on him. As no extra allowance was given him for these unusual expenses he was obliged to pay them himself, and in this way expended more than $2,000 a year beyond his pay. In other words, he served his country in a position of the greatest responsibility and peril and paid $2,000 a year for the privilege, so that he had in this way, at the end of the war, exhausted his slender private resources.

As has been said, Colonel Hunt's command was fully equal to that of a corps. At the battle of Gettysburg, for example, his artillery consisted of sixty-five batteries (three hundred and sixty-four guns), with over eight thousand men, seven thousand horses, and large trains of ammunition and stores, the whole divided into fourteen brigades. At the investment of Petersburg his command was even more extensive, for he there had sole control of the siege operations south of the Appomattox, which embraced the entire Army of the Potomac and one corps of the Army of the James. And it is to be borne in mind that his duties, unlike those of a general of infantry, were double, being, first, those of a commander of troops on the field of battle, and, secondly, those of an administrative officer having charge of ammunition trains and supplies. And yet no major-general of artillery was admissible, although there were issued during the war one hundred and fifty-six commissions of major-general.

Had promotions to the highest grades of the Army been by seniority, as it is in the Navy, Colonel Hunt would have been for years a major-general, and, when retired, the senior of that grade.

As a retired officer he is now properly eligible to the rank whose duties he performed during the war, and was performing at the date of his retirement. Precedents for such promotions are numerous. Besides the cases of Colonels Robinson and Sickles, and Lieutenant-Colonel Carroll and Major Ricketts, who were retired as major-generals under the general acts of August 3, 1861, and July 28, 1866, there is the case of Brigadier-General Ord, retired on his brevet rank of major-general by special act, January 28, 1881, and of Col. S. P. Heintzelman as major-general, by joint resolution April 10, 1869; Colonel Crawford, as brigadier-general, by special act of March 3, 1875; and Colonel Emory as brigadier-general, by special act of June 26, 1876.

To illustrate the saving by the Government in consequence of restricting the chief of artillery to the grade and the staff of a brigadier-general, instead of those of a major-general commanding a corps, the following tables are given:

Pay of a major-general during the war, per annum	$5,368 50
Staff, five lieutenant-colonels	11,272 50
Three aids	5,445 00
		$22,086 00
Average pay of General Hunt as colonel and brigadier-general	3,453 50
One inspector-general	2,254 50
One assistant adjutant-general	1,561 50
Two aids	2,966 00
Saving per annum		11,850 50
Saving for the four years of war		47,402 00

The esteem in which Colonel Hunt is held by his companions in arms is shown by the accompanying request in aid of this bill, signed by all the chiefs of the military bureaus of the War Department (Appendix B).

Your committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

In this campaign he was twice wounded. He commanded his battery at the battle of Bull Run, Virginia, July 21, 1861; commanded the artillery reserve in the Peninsular campaign of 1862. At the siege of Yorktown, the battles of Gaines's Mill, Garnett's farm, White Oak Swamp, Glendale, Turkey Bend, and Malvern Hill. As chief of artillery he commanded the artillery of the Army of the Potomac in the subsequent campaigns of that army, being engaged in the battles of South Mountain, Antietam, and Fredericksburg, in 1862; Chancellorsville, Gettysburg, Rappahannock Station, in 1863; Wilderness, Spottsylvania Court-House, North Anna, Totopotomoy, Cold Harbor, assaults of Petersburg, June 15-18, 1864; siege of that place and its capture, and was present at the capitulation of the Army of Northern Virginia, at Appomattox, April 9, 1865. R. C. DRUM,
Adjutant-General.

Mr. PRICE. There is some slight opposition to the bill.

Mr. WHEELER. If there is, I claim the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] is entitled to the floor for one hour if he desires it. He can occupy it now or he can yield at this time to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PRICE] and reserve his time.

Mr. WHEELER. I will reserve my time.

Mr. PRICE. I only desire for a moment the attention of the House. I understand as well as any gentleman can it is a thankless effort or task to undertake to stem the tide of sentiment that has too long governed the action of this House in the appropriation of pensions based on rank, and purely on rank and position. All that has been said, or may hereafter be said, eulogistic of the character and military record of General Hunt, I fully indorse now. But I look abroad over this country and I find there is an amount of unrest that causes thoughtful men to fear for the consequences of a dissatisfied rebellion, turbulent feeling among the masses, arising mainly from a conviction forced upon their minds by our acts that we are unjust as between those who serve and those who govern.

Looking over the statutes, I find it cost us last year $1,113,000 to pay our retired Army list. I do not know that that is a dollar more than it ought to be. But I do know, if you continue this practice, you may continue it until the hour shall have arrived when the people will rebel, if they are not already in a condition of rebellion against a system based upon simply official position.

Will you tell me that the man who commanded, bright, brilliant, gallant, brave, daring as he may have been, is the only one entitled to the gratitude of this American people? Will you tell me that as an American Congress we can sit here day after day and year after year legislating in the interest of these men because of their conspicuous gallantry, while other men equally brave, equally self-sacrificing, equally devoted to principle are starving in squalid homes and dying in poor-houses all over the country? I tell you the system is unjust in itself and disastrous in its consequences and will react against us some time unless we remedy the wrong.

Look over the retired-list of your Navy and you will find that $778,000 were appropriated to it last year. I understand there are two conditions in which men may be retired; and those reasons for retirement are certainly entitled to consideration on the part of the Government. One is when an individual is retired because of age. That is part of the contract. The other is when by reason of wounds received in the service he has become disqualified from duty, in which case he is entitled to be retired with three-fourths pay. That also is part of the contract. You will find that last year $55,000 were paid to men mentally and physically disqualified, but not so disqualified from any cause attributable to the service.

As I have said, this whole principle is unjust in its operation and disastrous in its consequences. We have no right to expect the people to be attached to the institutions of our country if you continue in this line by making the rich richer and the poor poorer.

Bring in, if you will, one broad comprehensive pension bill making a distinction between those who served and those who commanded. I might consent to such a general bill; but I protest in the name of honesty and of the American people against singling out individual cases in this way. Take this man who has been receiving, according to the report, $3,450 a year. You propose to make his pay over $5,000. The report says we have been saved the difference between these two amounts. And, therefore, because he has not received the highest compensation known to the law in the highest position in the Army, his pay must now be increased from three thousand dollars and odd to five thousand dollars and odd. This proposition has only to be looked at for one minute, and regarded by the light of facts outside the atmosphere which pervades this Chamber, to be recognized as repugnant to every principle of justice and to the fundamental idea of our political and social system that every American has the right to be equal to every other American. His was not the only patriotism; his was not the only gallantry.

I venture the prediction that when applications are made here for other men who served in the ranks, men as brave, as gallant, as capable of leading (they could not all be leaders), you will leave them neglected, forlorn, forsaken, and will thus intensify the feeling of popular indignation which, if you continue this practice of legislating for favorites, must produce results greatly detrimental to the interests of the whole country. Gentlemen say we must reward and encourage these men because we shall need them in positions of command in the event of another war. Sir, I grant that we shall need commanders, but if these recognitions are intended to stimulate men to exhibit the characteristics of daring and military leadership, if that is your motive, I ask, where are the objects, where are the stimulants, that will induce men to take up arms and rush to fill the ranks of your armies? Are you pursuing this course of policy in the expectation that your next army is to be made up of those in command only? Whether that is your purpose or not your policy will inevitably have that tendency. I can show you on my table scores of letters from men who served in the ranks of the armies of the Union, who say in substance, "We would not enlist again nor have our children to enlist if the present policy of legislation in these matters is to be continued." In the long three years that I have had any personal knowledge of Congress I have never known but one of these outrageous propositions beaten by the House, and that was on last Monday week.

In that case it was proposed to raise a pension from $30 to $50 a month, and this House deliberately and intelligently defeated the proposition. Here is a bill involving the same principle, because in that case the proposed increase was based solely upon the fact that the applicant was the wife of a major. In this case a colonel or a brigadier-general is to be the beneficiary, and gentlemen seem to be tumbling head over heels after each other to see which can get there first to pass the bill. I believe that if there was a proposition here to vote a pension of a million dollars to a brigadier-general with a sore toe, men would advocate it and vote for it who would not be willing to vote a pension of two dollars and a half to a man who served under him in the ranks and who risked his life as bravely and gallantly as any leader ever did. I make no fight on the leaders. I hold that when a man assumes leadership he is not necessarily any less a good man on that account; but I hold also that when he steps down and goes back among the people whence he came, he becomes one of them again and is entitled to no more consideration, no more reward, and no more blame because of his leadership than any of his equally worthy fellow-citizens.

Mr. Chairman, I would not be regarded as among those who say that a man in an official position must necessarily be a bad man, or that a man because he is in the possession of wealth must necessarily be a bad man; but neither wealth nor position is any index to me of the strength of the claim that a man has upon the justice or the generosity of his country.

Mr. WHEELER resumed the floor, and yielded five minutes to Mr. PETTIBONE.

Mr. PETTIBONE. Mr. Chairman, I do not agree with my eloquent friend from Wisconsin [Mr. PRICE], that because I can not do justice all at once to all men I therefore will not do justice to any particular individual. I believe, sir, in doing what I can when I can, and it is enough always to control my vote for me to know that I am dealing with the case of some citizen who, for distinguished merit, for distinguished courage, for distinguished skill and capacity, has deserved well of the Republic. I am heartily in favor of the passage of this bill, and I say to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PRICE] that it does not become any civilian who staid at home during the war to criticise what we soldiers desire to do for each other. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman says that he does not favor any stimulant being offered for distinguished service, for distinguished devotion, for distinguished ability. There is where he and I differ toto cælo. I would give such stimulants—stimulants of reward, of honor, of fame—to every worthy soldier of the Republic, so that we may have leaders in time of need upon whom we can depend. And, sir, as a volunteer soldier, I repel the statements which the gentleman says are contained in his letters, that if we do such things as this bill contemplates his constituents or his correspondents will never again rally to the defense of the country. I will tell you what sort of soldiers those men were. They were bounty-jumpers; not the boys that went to the front. The young men that went to the front did not go for pay. I know of young men who resigned places worth $100 a month and more to eat "hard-tack" and bacon and fight those gentlemen over there for $13 a month. It will be ill for America when the idea prevails that because we give a pension, because we give a mark of distinction to a veteran general whose gallantry and skill, as I verily believe, turned the tide of battle at Gettysburg, the country is going to be ruined and all the patriotism taken out of the bosoms of the men who carry the muskets. It is false, and I repel it.

Mr. WHEELER resumed the floor and yielded ten minutes to Mr. PETERS.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, in the last Congress I opposed a bill similar to this having for its purpose the placing of Colonel Hunt on the retired-list as a major-general. I do not desire to occupy to-day much time on this question. I am opposed to this bill because I do not think it is right. I differ entirely from my friend from Tennessee [Mr. PETTIBONE] in regard to the efficiency of the artillery service at Gettysburg; but I do not think the efficiency or inefficiency of the artillery at Gettysburg has anything to do with the bill before the House.

The main reason urged for the passage of this bill is the fact that Colonel Hunt, during the war, had tendered to him and might have accepted the position of major-general, but for various reasons, which to him seemed sufficient, declined to accept that promotion. I say, Mr. Chairman, in all candor, that ends the matter as far as this bill is concerned. He has no claim upon this country or this Congress which entitles him now to come and ask that Congress give to him what he declined to accept during the war. He not only declined to accept this promotion, according to the report of the committee, but by doing so he kept meritorious officers under him from receiving promotion to which they were entitled. In this way he did an injustice to a large number of officers who were doing as valuable service during the war as he did, and who were entitled to the promotion which he prevented them from receiving by refusing to accept promotion when it was offered to him. His services were no greater than those rendered by a large number of other officers in the military service during the war.

Another reason that is urged in favor of promoting Colonel Hunt now to the position of major-general is the fact that he was subjected to enormous expense by reason of his being the chief of artillery. I think that is a very flimsy excuse to be presented in any report as a reason why we should at this late day place this gentleman upon the retired-list of the Army as a major-general.

Aside from other considerations, the war is now over, and this gentleman is not in needy circumstances. It is not urged that the salary which he receives as a colonel on the retired-list is not sufficient to maintain him during the remainder of his life. I can not, therefore, look upon this bill in any other light than a proposition to give to him a certain amount of money which he does not need to make him comfortable in his declining years, while it is taking it from others who do need it.

The bill seems to me unjust in principle and one which should not be tolerated. I simply desire to enter my protest against any bill of this kind, especially the one before the House; and I call upon all those who are in favor of correct principles to vote against its passage.

Mr. WHEELER addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. PRICE. I yield now for fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSTON].

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I do not feel like opposing any bill the object of which is to promote a soldier for meritorious and gallant service in behalf of his country. But I do feel called upon to oppose this bill for several reasons. I believe I can speak for this side of the House as well as for myself that we are thankful to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] for the lecture for our action toward the soldiers. And in answer to him I will say we will try to take care of our soldiers if we are permitted to do so.

Now, with several other gentlemen upon this side of the House, I have thought the principle is a wrong one to select out one particular soldier and give him promotion and distinction while there are thousands of other men who were as gallant and as meritorious who are left uncared-for, unrewarded, and neglected.

Let us see exactly how this matter stands. If I understand the position of this gentleman, he was taken by the Government when a boy, educated at its expense at the Military Academy at West Point, selected out because he happened to be one of the favored few to be educated at the expense of the General Government, graduated at that military institution, and then entered the service as an officer of the regular Army. He served in that capacity, adopting a service of his own choosing, until he was old enough to go upon the retired-list. Now this bill proposes to give him a rank upon the retired-list which he did not have while he was on duty in the service; a distinction this House would not confer on any volunteer officer of the Army, I do not care how gallant or how meritorious he may have been.

But, sir, I object to it for a further reason; and I will object to it although I do not know whether there is another member on my side of the House who will agree with me. I see by the public prints the President of the United States has decided that in making appointments to the Military Academy at West Point and to the Naval Academy at Annapolis he will prefer the sons of officers of the regular Army and Navy over the sons of the private soldiers who carried the flag and saved their country. For one I do not believe that principle is a right one. I do not believe because a boy happens to be the son of a man who was educated at the expense of the Government at West Point or the Naval Academy he should have preference in being selected to go to one of these institutions over the son of a private soldier or sailor who may have been more meritorious and braver.

Now, sir, this bill leads right along in that same channel, that because you once educated a man at West Point you must not only look after him forever but he must be singled out; and because he has been educated by the Government he must have special privileges thrown around him, thus establishing a privileged class, which I do not believe to be right. It is following right along in the same position I understand the President to have taken that he will select out and promote only this favored class and the sons of this favored class and leave the rank and file of the country, while the son of the poor laboring man or soldier who may have carried a musket and knapsack for four years must stand back. For one, I am opposed to the introduction of any such canker of aristocracy into our system. I am opposed to any class arrogating to itself the privilege of preference in promotions and that all others must stand back. I say the principle is wrong, whether there is any member on this side of the House who will agree with me or not. I say to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PRICE] I will stand by him and vote against this bill as a matter of principle.

He is already retired with the full rank he was entitled to or earned in the service, and you had just as well go back and say you will take some private soldier out of the ranks and have him mustered as a captain as to pass this bill. Why, Mr. Chairman? Simply because of the fact that the soldier was too big a coward to rush to the front and do his full share of the fighting; he did not go to the front; he was not disabled or killed, and therefore he kept himself safe, and if the other man had kept out of the way he would have got the promotion. That is just the same principle embodied in this bill. You seek to promote this man now because there were some circumstances at the time that kept him from getting the promotion. Why, any circumstances that kept him from getting the promotion would justify the passage of the bill if you can find justification for it on such a report as this.

I do not believe the bill is right, for it makes a special object of this man, while you say to the thousands of men, equally brave, equally determined, equally meritorious, we will not grant you relief, but we will take up an isolated case—the case of a man mentioned here—because he happened to be a graduate of West Point, and promote him to the exclusion of every other soldier.

I say, sir, that is not right, and I will be found in opposition to the principle embodied here whenever a vote is taken upon the question.

Mr. PRICE. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN].

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will yield to me just a moment.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Very well.

Mr. SPRINGER. I merely wanted to correct a statement of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSTON] in regard to a publication that he has seen in the newspapers to the effect that the President stated he would recommend the sons of Army and Navy officers exclusively for appointment to positions in the Academies at West Point and Annapolis as against the sons of the private soldiers of the Army.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I should have remarked, Mr. Chairman, in this connection, that I saw this in a Democratic newspaper. I do not know, therefore, whether it is true or not. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not know whether it is true or not, either; but the gentleman stated it upon his authority, and I supposed the intimation was that he believed it to be true. But I want to assure him that the President of the United States has made no such statement. If anything whatever has been said upon the subject it was simply to the effect that our Army and Navy officers, having no fixed place of residence in the country, have as a consequence no members of Congress to whom they can apply for the appointment of their sons to these positions. As to the soldiers, they are all over the country; they are in our Congressional districts; their sons are eligible to appointment from the Congressional districts, and consequently their interests are looked after by their Representatives.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. That applies I presume only to the appointments to be made by the Executive, not to those which are made by members of Congress.

Mr. SPRINGER. As I understand it, the gentleman has reference now to the twelve who are to be appointed at large. This class of appointments was intended for the benefit of the officers of the Army and the other citizens who have no fixed abodes, and who consequently can not have their sons appointed through the members of Congress.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. As a matter of fact is it not true that he did appoint sons of the regular officers of the Army?

Mr. SPRINGER. That list was intended expressly for that purpose. As I have said, it applies to the sons of officers of the regular Army and officers of the Navy who have no fixed place of abode in the Congressional districts, and also to citizens of the District of Columbia for instance, who can not get any such appointments from the Congressional districts because they have no representation or no representatives through whom they can be appointed. The gentleman knows, of course, that before such appointments can be made the applicant must swear that he has been a resident of the district from which he is appointed for at least twelve months preceding the date of the appointment. Therefore if it was not for this list the sons of the Army officers and citizens of the District of Columbia would be deprived of the possibility of sending their sons to the academy.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Can not the son of a regular Army officer enter if he is successful in his competition for the place just as well as any other boy?

Mr. SPRINGER. He can, of course; but not unless he has been a resident of the locality for the time fixed. The gentleman will observe, when he gets authority to make an appointment of a boy, that the fact that he has been a resident of his district for the twelve months immediately preceding will be a prerequisite.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. But he has got a home somewhere.

Mr. ROGERS. No; not within the terms of the law making these appointments. This implies citizenship.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, there was a bill introduced in the last Congress for the purpose of bestowing the benefaction that is intended by this bill upon Colonel Hunt by name. That bill failed to become a law. This bill seeks to accomplish the same result in a different way. In the title of the bill, as it has been read, his name does not appear as the beneficiary; but the object of the bill is the same. We find that the opening sentence of the report is as follows:

We find that the only officer in the Army who can be affected by the bill is Col. and Bvt. Maj. Gen. Henry J. Hunt.

The question is whether the House is ready to enter upon this species of class legislation for the benefit of individuals. It is not claimed that General Hunt did not obtain the rank he earned in the line of his soldierly action during the war. It is not claimed so far as I can see that any discrimination was made against him during the war. This bill was here and was discussed in the last Congress, and it was stated in the debate that took place, which I will not take the time of the House to recur to and read—it was stated very specifically that he chose this line in preference to any other. And who would not rather be the chief of the artillery division of the great Army that the Government of the United States mustered than be in a subordinate place with even a little higher rank? He chose his place.

In the last Congress one of the foundations on which the claim was proposed to be rested was that this officer had spent large sums of money in the entertainment of those who had come into contact with him during the war. It has been found by experience that that is not a good basis upon which to rest a claim looking for an appropriation from the Treasury.

The question here is, Shall we enter upon this legislation? What demand is there for it? What excuse is there for it? Have we not tens of thousands of men in this country who fought as valiantly as Colonel Hunt did? And in making that comparison I am not proposing to be invidious, for that he was brave, that he was efficient, that he had all the ability necessary to discharge all the duties that devolved upon him, I not only admit, but state with pride and to his credit. But if we begin here where is the practice to stop? Where are we to draw the line? We legislate for General Hunt to-day. General somebody else will come to-morrow. It is true the time fixed in this bill is after forty years of service. But who can tell that next year it will not be thirty years of service; that the year following it will not be twenty years; and that in place of Congress devoting its time to the public measures to meet evils and wants that cry loudly for remedy and for relief, our time will be frittered away in considering special cases that are of a questionable propriety, and establishing precedents that can result in injury and injury only?

I have not the pleasure of a personal acquaintance with General Hunt. I have no feeling in the matter save to do what is best in legislation; and in doing that we must remember that the action of to-day becomes the precedent of to-morrow, and the custom of times following.

Now, is there sufficient excuse for this? Is it claimed by any member that the salary which this officer gets as a colonel is not sufficient to sustain him? No man will be rash enough to say that. If I remember correctly Colonel Hunt gets over $3,000, without any expense or cost entailed on him by his position except that of his own living and without any duties to perform. What is the reason for this increase? Why should we go into this class of legislation? It must be remembered that to-day he gets more than three-fourths of the governors of the States receive, notwithstanding that they have multiform duties and many kinds of expenses to meet out of their salaries.

I would be slow to do injustice to any man. But I do not think it is injustice to let one American citizen, protected by the laws and the Constitution of his country, take the same fate that falls to the lot of all the other citizens. It is not simply the amount of money involved in the bill. It is not simply the elevation of this officer to a different rank. But it is the class legislation, taking one citizen that has no more bravery than another, no more claims upon the Government than any other man who sacrificed his health and his life for the good of his country, and elevating that one man. It taxes the humble man who earns but $150 a year to pay this man more than $5,000 a year. There is no justice in it. It is not demanded in the interest of wise legislation. No precedent can be claimed for it; and I insist, Mr. Chairman, that this soldier will evince the highest type of patriotism and of that manliness which is of the very essence of good citizenship by taking the same lot that is given to all citizens by that flag and by our common Constitution and common laws, and living contentedly under them.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PRICE] has fifteen minutes remaining.

Mr. PRICE. I shall reserve that time until the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] shall have occupied his time.

Mr. WHEELER. I understand the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs desires to take an hour in his own right.

Mr. REED, of Maine. If no one else takes the floor at this time, I desire to make some remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine is recognized.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I think there is enough in this bill in its phraseology and its peculiar characteristics to awaken the attention of the House, not merely to this bill, which is perhaps of itself of little consequence, but to the whole class of bills of like character, and to the kind of business to which the House is invited. Here is a bill which when it was originally introduced specified the name of the individual who has been the subject of discussion in the House. It is evident that careful consideration has induced his friends to abandon that form of bill. And why? Because the Constitution of the United States declares that all officers, with certain exceptions, shall be appointed by the President of the United States, and not by the legislative branch of the Government. This bill, therefore, was changed because the other form of bill, which was like the Fitz-John Porter bill, was unconstitutional.

Now, how does it treat the situation? There are four descriptions of the officer who is to receive the honor of Presidential selection. First, he must be on the retired-list; second, he must have been chief of artillery in one of the large armies of the United States; third, he must have held an artillery commission for forty years; and last, he must have been retired with the rank of major-general and the thanks of Congress. What does that mean? It means General Hunt. This, as a gentleman has observed in familiar phraseology, this is "whipping the devil around a stump;" but it is a confession that there is a stump. It is an admission that this is an attempt on the part of the legislative branch to usurp the powers of the executive—a thing not to be desired nowadays. If we discard this kind of legislation, when presented directly, as unconstitutional, why should we pass upon it when it is presented in the guise of a fraud? Does an unconstitutional act become any better on account of a fraudulent evasion of the Constitution? Why, see the field of honest endeavor that is opened to this House by a bill of this kind. We are to take charge of the distribution of rewards among Army officers in a war that had its last throes more than twenty years ago; we are to adjudicate upon all the claims of favor, upon the jealousies, upon the personal pride, upon the personal hopes, of the officers of the armies that participated in the last war. Are you prepared to undertake that? Think of the time and the eloquence and the maps that were spent upon the case of one man at the beginning of this session. Think of the time of the public that was wasted because that question was forced upon us. Are we to have these things forced upon us day after day? If they are presented and presented with any considerable force we must debate them. Is it not worth while to give measures of this kind, by our vote to-day, such a quietus that we need be troubled with them no more?

We have a docket encumbered beyond parallel with business that legitimately belongs to us under the Constitution. Do we want to add to it a long list of cases like this, of which we have no constitutional control whatever?

Mr. SPRINGER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Maine a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maine yield?

Mr. REED, of Maine. With the greatest pleasure.

Mr. SPRINGER. I wish to ask the gentleman whether there is any difference between the bill for the relief of Fitz-John Porter, which he pronounces unconstitutional, and the case of General Grant.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I think so.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman state what the difference is?

Mr. REED, of Maine. Oh, no. I am not giving instruction in legal distinctions to the gentleman from Illinois. It would be absolutely impossible for me. I should have to start from the ground. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes. I think it would be impossible for the gentleman to point out the difference, for there is none, so far as the power of Congress is concerned.

Mr. LAIRD. Mr. Chairman, there are some questions of fact involved in this matter to which I wish to address myself. The distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] presents an issue of law, and he supports it by the fact that a like attempted encroachment upon the powers of the Executive has recently been met with a striking rebuke. Well, Mr. Chairman, from my standpoint, and possibly from the standpoint of the distinguished gentleman from Maine, the American Congress is about as competent to exercise both the legislative and executive functions as the gentleman at the other end of the Avenue [laughter], at least I will answer for my share of the responsibility. But to the question of fact. I had not intended to say anything about this, because I am not particularly anxious to inflict myself upon the House, but I understand something of the facts from personal knowledge, and if General Hunt, the old chief of artillery of the Army of the Potomac, is to go down in this House to-day, I want the honor of going down with him.

General Hunt, to my personal knowledge, is as poor as Lazarus and he is as proud as Lucifer. I do not believe that for all the rewards that can come to him by virtue of your favorable action upon this bill he would submit himself for a moment to the sneers and reflections of the gentlemen upon this side of the House. I trust that if we discuss him at all we shall discuss him respectfully, as becomes us in the case of a man of whom it can without question be said that he stood at the head of the most conspicuous branch of our military service and earned a right to the title that was bestowed upon the knight of old—that of being without fear and without reproach. And as he was then he is now and will be forever.

My friend from Kansas [Mr. PETERS] finds in the fact that General Hunt, then commanding the artillery of the Army of the Potomac, refused to accept promotion a grievous fault. I admit, sir, that therein General Hunt sinned against the judgment of the gentleman from Kansas—a judgment formed a quarter of a century after the fact. I admit that therein he may have sinned against the judgment of some gentlemen who were conspicuous in the pursuits of peace during the four years of war when this man commanded a conspicuous arm of your service.

I apprehend, Mr. Chairman, that some of us might not be so round and fat and sleek and mighty physically, shining like the shield of Achilles to-day, if we had undergone even a part of the vicissitudes of war which fell to the lot of General Hunt.

General Hunt, for the good of the service of his country, saw fit at that time to make himself an example of self-sacrifice. Does it become the American Congress to forget that in twenty-five years? General Hunt, at the head of your artillery service at the battle of Gettysburg, so massed his batteries upon Cemetery Ridge and so managed his branch of the service that Pickett's splendid charge broke harmlessly, bloody wave on top of bloody wave, against the foot of Cemetery Ridge, where Hunt's artillery stood. The sagacity of that officer upon that field—a field which chiseled the faces of brave men with terror, and which, when night closed, was strewn with the bodies of eighty thousand mangled men—the sagacity of that officer upon that field in reserving his ammunition for the confederate infantry may have made it possible for the flag of the Union to float in peace above this Capitol to-day.

Does it become the American Congress in the course of twenty-five years to forget this? Mr. Chairman, I submit there is this equity. General Hunt was willing to sacrifice himself to the demands of the service, and to the demands of a country then in extremis, and admitting this, shall we forget the mighty equity which springs from his brave sacrifice? So far as I am concerned, I speak as one of the people supposed to be opposed to this kind of legislation, for I belonged to the class of "mudsills" of the Army; and I believe my record will show that on every occasion where the opportunity has offered I have voted for that infamous class legislation called the placing of private soldiers upon the pension-roll. Am I thereby estopped from paying a proper tribute to the self-sacrificing leader when he is presented in his own proper person?

Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a word for the private soldiers (and as the Irish pilot said about the rocks in New York Harbor when his ship struck, I was one of them), that I think if they were here to listen to the expression of extraordinary solicitude for their rights and interests on the part of certain gentlemen—a solicitude which exhibits itself in a disposition to condemn all recognition of the leader, they would dispose of such professions much less respectfully than the gentleman now addressing the House is compelled to do. In view of the tender regard for one another's feelings which is enforced by the rules of the House I leave it to the imagination of the gentlemen to determine without restraint of rule the literal exactions of that estimate.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question for information? As he is a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, I would like him to state what is the pay now being received by Colonel Hunt as a retired officer?

Mr. LAIRD. I am frank to answer that I do not know. It is not a question of dollars and cents.

Mr. BRAGG. I will answer. It is $2,625.

Mr. STEELE. I think the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs [Mr. BRAGG] is mistaken. Probably he does not count in the longevity pay.

Mr. BRAGG. After five years' retired-pay the longevity-pay commences, and is estimated on the retired-pay proper, the officer drawing after five years' service 10 per cent., after ten years' service 20 per cent., and so on.

Mr. STEELE. I think a colonel after twenty years' service gets $4,500, and when retired gets three-fourths of that amount.

Mr. BRAGG. I have the official Army pay-roll before me.

Mr. STEELE. What, then, is the pay of a colonel after twenty years' service?

Mr. BRAGG. The pay of a colonel on the retired-list is $2,625.

Mr. STEELE. What is the pay of a colonel after twenty years' service?

The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen will suspend their remarks. The Committee of the Whole will rise informally to receive a message from the Senate

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

COL. HENRY J. HUNT.

The Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar resumed its session.

Mr. LAIRD. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. SPRINGER. Would it be agreeable to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LAIRD] to yield now for a motion that the committee rise, retaining his right to the floor when this subject is resumed? I do not think we shall have time to pass all the bills which have been laid aside for a favorable report if this discussion continues.

Mr. LAIRD. Is the course suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] agreeable to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER]?

Mr. WHEELER. It is.

Mr. LAIRD. Then I will yield for the motion that the committee rise. Of course it is understood that I retain my right to the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. When the consideration of this bill is resumed, the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LAIRD] will be entitled to the floor.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. CRISP having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HATCH reported that the Committee of the Whole House, having had under consideration the Private Calendar, had directed him to report sundry bills with various recommendations.

BILLS PASSED.

Bills of the following titles, reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, were severally ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, they were accordingly read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. 33) for the relief of Alexander K. Shepard;
A bill (H. R. 4836) for the relief of Thomas McBride;
A bill (H. R. 4839) for the relief of E. P. McNeal;
A bill (H. R. 1905) for the relief of Theodore W. Tallmadge;
A bill (H. R. 2935) for the relief of James Price; and

A bill (H. R. 2995) for the relief of Francis H. Shaw.

Amendments to bills of the following titles were severally agreed to, and the bills as amended were ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, they were accordingly read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. 898) for the relief of the estate of Joel C. Frazier, deceased; and

A bill (H. R. 2066) for the relief of Alfred McMurtrie;

An amendment to an act (S. 416) for the relief of J. M. Lobban, was agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

J. D. MORRISON.

A bill (H. R. 5187) for the relief of J. D. Morrison, surviving partner of C. M. & J. D. Morrison, was laid on the table, and, on motion of Mr. TUCKER, by unanimous consent, the Committee on Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 353) for the relief of J. D. Morrison, surviving partner of C. M. & J. D. Morrison; which was ordered to a third reading, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

MRS. LIZZIE D. CLARKE.

The bill (H. R. 958) for the relief of Mrs. Lizzie D. Clarke was laid on the table; and the bill (S. 32) for the relief of Mrs. Lizzie D. Clarke, of New Orleans, was ordered to a third reading, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SPRINGER moved to reconsider the several votes just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SPRINGER. Some pension bills reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar remain over and I presume come up now as unfinished business. Is it not in order to dispose of those pension cases coming over from last week?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. As the Chair understands the action taken at the preceding night session on these bills they are not in order and will not be until at a night session their consideration has been resumed. The Chair is informed the matter has been investigated by the Speaker of the House and he has come to that conclusion; that is, that until further order is taken at a night session they can only be considered at a night session.

THE COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE.

Mr. CLARDY. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce to ask for present action on the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Saturday, April 10, after the reading of the Journal, be set apart for the consideration of resolutions authorizing the construction of bridges across navigable rivers, the establishment of light-houses and ports of entry, and bills relating to the Life-Saving Service reported from the Committee on Commerce.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. HOLMAN. I have no objection to the first and last series of bills mentioned, but as to the others it seems to me there is nothing of a pressing character in them. Let the resolution be again read.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. HOLMAN. Ports of entry should come up in the regular way; but I have no objection to the others.

Mr. CLARDY. I will modify the resolution in that respect by striking out the words "ports of entry."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution as modified? The Chair hears no objection, and the resolution is before the House.

Mr. DUNHAM. I offer the following substitute for the resolution.

Mr. COWLES, of North Carolina. I object to the resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is too late.

Mr. HOLMAN. I make the point of order against the proposed substitute that where unanimous consent has been given to a particular measure a substitute can not be offered of an entirely different nature.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. When the question is before the House for consideration by unanimous consent it stands in the same position as if it came up in regular order, and it is subject to amendments which are germane.

Mr. HOLMAN. Unanimous consent was given only for the purpose of receiving and adopting the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARDY].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Unanimous consent was granted for the introduction of the resolution for consideration, and as the Chair heard no objection the resolution came before the House.

Mr. DUNHAM. Let my amendment be read.

Mr. EDEN. I wish to give notice that if, when unanimous consent is given to consider a resolution from a committee to set apart a day for the consideration of a certain class of bills, the resolution is to be open to all sorts of amendments, in the future unanimous consent will not be given.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is a matter exclusively for the House to determine. The Chair has no control over it whatever.

Mr. CLARDY. I demand the previous question upon the resolution and also upon the substitute if that be held in order.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I ask that it be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Saturday, April 10, immediately after the morning hour, be set apart for the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Commerce other than the Eads ship-railroad bill and the bill for regulation of interstate commerce.

Mr. BUCHANAN. But the original resolution was by motion of the gentleman who offered it modified. I thereupon asked that the modified resolution be reported to the House in order to ascertain what it was upon which we were called to vote. It has not yet been read from the desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolution of the gentleman from Missouri as now modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Saturday, April 10, after the reading of the Journal, be set apart for the consideration of bills authorizing the construction of bridges across navigable rivers, the establishment of light-houses, and bills relating to the Life-Saving Service reported from the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CLARDY. On that I demand the previous question.

Mr. ROGERS. Let me ask, Mr. Speaker, how does the other proposition come before the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair submitted the request of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARDY] for unanimous consent for the consideration of the resolution which has just been read. The Chair asked if there was objection and no objection was made. The subject was then before the House for action. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DUNHAM] then moved as a substitute for the original resolution of the gentleman from Missouri that which has been read.

Mr. ROGERS. Has that been withdrawn?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It has not been withdrawn, as the Chair understands. The gentleman from Missouri now moves the previous question upon the resolution and the substitute.

Mr. ROGERS. I want to give notice, Mr. Speaker, that we can not pass that resolution without a quorum of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri to indicate specifically to the House what character of bills is embraced in that resolution?

Mr. CLARDY. The resolution specifies the bills.

Mr. REAGAN. I think if the House understood the resolution which was offered by the gentleman from Missouri there would be no opposition to it. The Committee on Commerce has reported a large number of bridge and light-house bills and bills of that character, which members are especially interested in having some disposition made of, and which are not likely to lead to any contest on the floor of the House. The object of the Committee on Commerce, and its whole object, is simply to get a day set apart so as to enable us to get them before the House and acted upon in accordance with the wishes of many of the members of the House. I will state that it is not our purpose, and we do not propose to introduce any bill that will be controverted.

Mr. MCADOO. Let me ask the gentleman from Texas if it is the intention of the committee under that resolution to call up the bill to bridge the Arthur Kill; for if it is, I can tell him that there will be a very decided contest over it.

Mr. REAGAN. It is not the purpose to call up any bills which would lead to a contest.

Mr. BUCHANAN. It is important to understand exactly what bills the gentleman proposes to call up before such consent can be given.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The previous question has been ordered, and debate is not in order.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. DUNHAM. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DUNHAM. Has the previous question been ordered on the passage of the resolution and the amendment or simply upon the resolution?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It has been ordered upon the resolution and the amendment.

Mr. ROGERS. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. I want to know what the vote now about to be taken is on.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will again report the substitute offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DUNHAM] upon which the vote is now to be taken.

The substitute was again read.

Mr. DUNHAM. If the House will allow me a moment I will explain the reason for offering that as a substitute. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the substitute of the gentleman from Illinois.

The substitute was not agreed to.

The question recurring on the adoption of the original resolution offered by Mr. CLARDY, the House divided; and there were—ayes 52, noes 17.

Mr. DUNHAM, Mr. MCADOO, and others. No quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will order tellers.

Mr. CLARDY and Mr. DUNHAM were appointed tellers.

Mr. WISE. I move that the House take a recess in obedience to the order of the House for Friday evening sessions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House is now dividing upon a question, the point of order being made that no quorum is present; and hence the motion for a recess is not in order.

Mr. DUNHAM. Mr. Speaker, I have just been informed by members of the Committee on Commerce that the gentleman from Missouri was instructed by the committee to offer this resolution to-day in the form in which he has presented it. I was unaware of that instruction by the committee, and not desiring to act against my own committee, I withdraw the call for a quorum.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I renew it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia will then take the place of the gentleman from Illinois as one of the tellers.

Mr. CLARDY. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon that demand in view of the statement made by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I withdraw it.

So (no further count being demanded) the resolution of Mr. CLARDY was adopted.

Mr. HATCH moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PILOTAGE.

Mr. HAMMOND submitted the views of the minority on the bill (H. R. 6390) to abolish compulsory pilotage as to American sailing vessels; which was ordered to be printed with the views of the majority.

And then, on motion of Mr. SPRINGER (at 4 o'clock and 47 minutes p. m.), the House took a recess until 7.30 p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at 7.30 p. m.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CRISP). The Clerk will report the special order under which the House meets this evening.

The Clerk read the order, as follows:

Resolved, That on each Friday the House shall take a recess from 5 o'clock p. m. until 7.30 p. m., at which evening sessions private bills granting pensions reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions and the Committee on Pensions, and bills reported from the Judiciary Committee to remove political disabilities only, be considered.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of business under the special order just read.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, Mr. DOCKERY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole to consider bills upon the Private Calendar under the special order.

MARIA K. RITTER.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5693) for the relief of Maria K. Ritter.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Maria K. Ritter, of Cass County, Missouri, widow of H. K. Ritter, deceased, late of Company F, One hundred and eighty-fourth Regiment Pennsylvania Infantry.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5693) for the relief of Maria K. Ritter, submit the following report:

We find that Maria K. Ritter is the widow of Capt. Henry K. Ritter, of Company H, One hundred and eighty-fourth Pennsylvania Volunteers, who enlisted May 12, 1864, and was discharged July 14, 1865. June 3, 1864, at the battle of Cold Harbor, Va., he received a gunshot wound in the left hand, rendering his hand, as the report made at the time says, comparatively useless. In August, 1865, he applied for a pension, which was allowed, and received by him until his death in 1879.

It is alleged that during his service he contracted chronic diarrhea, which, it is claimed, was the cause of his death. The hospital record shows that March 31, 1865, he was "sick in quarters with diarrhea;" April 12, "in hospital with diarrhea;" June 1 to 8, "in quarters, no diagnosis;" June 26, "sick with diarrhea." The examining board at Pleasant Hill, Cass County, Missouri, report in July, 1874, that partial paralysis of the arm had resulted from the gunshot wound.

Albert J. Briggs testifies to an intimate acquaintance with the soldier from 1866 until his death; that during all that time he suffered from chronic diarrhea; that about ten days before his death he had a severe attack and was much debilitated and weakened by it. Saw him several times during his last illness and conversed with the attendants, and believes that chronic diarrhea was the principal cause of his death.

Samuel Perry testifies to an acquaintance from 1870, and during all the time he was troubled with that disease; that he saw him quite often before he was taken with fever, and that he knows he was hardly able to leave his bed on account of chronic diarrhea; was his nurse during his last illness, and that he suffered terribly with that complaint. G. F. Whitman testifies that he was a near neighbor and nurse, and fully corroborates the statements made by last witness. I. M. App, as near neighbor and nurse, testifies to the same. This is also corroborated by George W. Schuyler, another neighbor. The attending physician gave as the cause of his death, pneumonia complicated with chronic diarrhea.

Dr. E. E. Gilmore testifies that a few days after soldier's death he consulted with the attending physician as to the cause of Captain Ritter's death, and that the doctor stated that he did not die of pneumonia; that the lung trouble was not of sufficient extent to produce death but that he died of constitutional debility resulting from his condition of long standing. John Crum testifies that he often heard Captain Ritter say that the chronic diarrhea would cause his death; that he had no hope of recovery. Two Army surgeons also testify to their treatment of him for the disease while in the service.

The case was thoroughly investigated by two special examiners, who took the testimony of some thirty witnesses, all of whom corroborate the evidence already recited. Both of the examiners expressed their belief that the case was meritorious.

The attending physician testified that the captain died from exhaustion, and not from asphyxia. The evidence is overwhelming that the soldier contracted chronic diarrhea in the service; that he suffered with it until his death. That he had pneumonia during his last illness is not questioned, and the case was rejected on the theory that the latter disease was the immediate cause of his death.

The probabilities are that had he not been attacked with pneumonia he would have lingered several days longer. It is equally probable that had he never suffered with chronic diarrhea he would now be alive.

Your committee are forced, from the testimony submitted, to the conclusion that the light attack of pneumonia would not have resulted in death had it not been for his enfeebled condition resulting from long years of suffering with the other disease, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Chairman, that bill for the relief of Maria K. Ritter was passed over informally at the last Friday evening session at the request of Mr. MORRILL, of Kansas, who thought the case would be allowed in the Pension Office. He is not here at present, but I think the bill had better be passed over.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the order just made will be reconsidered, and the bill will retain its place upon the Calendar.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ISABELLA J. RAMSDELL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5022) increasing the pension of Isabella J. Ramsdell.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the rate of pension of Isabella J. Ramsdell, widow of David D. Ramsdell, who for over thirty years was a marine in the United States service, to $30 per month, and that the same begin at the death of her said husband, deducting therefrom the amount she has received under act of Congress approved July 1, 1884.

Mr. MATSON. That bill was pretty fully discussed at a former evening session, and I ask that it be now passed over informally.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, I was not present at the session when this bill was discussed. I would like to have some action taken on the bill, and I am prepared to make a statement of the facts, if the committee desire.

Mr. MATSON. There is no objection to hearing the gentleman's statement.

Mr. JAMES. Mrs. Ramsdell made application for a pension in the Forty-sixth Congress, and a bill granting it passed both the House and the Senate; but, being passed on the last day of the session, it was overlooked in some way and was not signed. In the Forty-seventh Congress no action was taken in the case. In the Forty-eighth Congress I introduced a bill granting her a pension and it passed the House, with arrearages. When the bill went to the Senate the arrearages were stricken out. Now, the facts of the case are these: This Mr. David D. Ramsdell served thirty-two years in the marine service. He served in the Florida war, in the Mexican war, and on the coast of China, and he also did some service in the war of the rebellion. His health, however, was completely broken down while he was in China. From 1868, when he left the service, until 1876, when, according to the statement of this report, he went into the United States marine hospital at Philadelphia, he was cared for by his wife, and she exhausted the little private property which she had in her own name in supporting him and caring for him. Then he went into the asylum, where he died in 1877. From 1877 until this time Mrs. Ramsdell has been entirely dependent upon the benevolent people about her, except in so far as she is supported by the pension, which she began to draw a little over a year ago.

The case is one of peculiar merit from the fact of the great length of service of Mr. Ramsdell. As I have stated, he served thirty-two years and was broken down in the service, and his wife was broken down in caring for him after he became disabled, so that she is now dependent upon the benevolence of her friends. Besides, she has an invalid daughter whom she has to support, and a young son who earns $3 a week. That is the extent of her income. Possibly the bill carries more than it ought to carry, and I am willing that it shall be amended so as to satisfy the views of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will inform the gentleman from New York that there is an amendment pending which was offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN]. The amendment will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

It is proposed to strike out the following: "And that the same begin at the death of her said husband, deducting therefrom the amount she has received under act of Congress approved July 1, 1884;" so that the bill, if amended, will read:

"That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the rate of pension of Isabella J. Ramsdell, widow of David D. Ramsdell, who for over thirty years was a marine in the United States service, to $30 per month."

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Chairman, the facts just stated by the gentleman from New York [Mr. JAMES] are the same that were stated here the other night; at least I do not remember that he has stated anything new. The proposition is to increase this widow's pension to $30 per month on account of her own physical disability and of the long service of her husband. That is an extraordinary proposition. There is another fact in the case which has been suggested to me, but which the gentleman from New York omitted to state, namely, that this lady now receives a pension by favor of act of Congress, having been unable to prove her claim in the Pension Office. It seems to me that we can not afford to make this kind of precedent, grading the pensions of widows by their own disabilities. I think it would be a dangerous precedent to establish. The question was very fully discussed the other night, and I am willing that this bill shall take the course that other unusual bills have taken; that is, that it shall be reported to the House to be acted upon next Friday. I am willing to make an agreement after we get into the House that all these bills that are of an extraordinary character shall be acted upon in the day session next Friday, when we can have a full House, or at least a quorum of the House, to vote on these extraordinary propositions. I make this suggestion in the interest of the business of these Friday evening sessions.

Whenever it becomes apparent that those of us who see fit to come here on Friday night have undertaken to pass bills that are extraordinary, that are innovations on the regular routine of pension business, our Friday evening sessions will be endangered, because the House will be necessarily alarmed at this extension of the privilege granted under the order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection on the part of the gentleman from New York [Mr. JAMES] to the proposition of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON]?

Mr. JAMES. I do not care to object to it.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, if there be no objection, the bill will go to the House with a favorable recommendation, to be acted upon, as suggested by the gentleman from Indiana, next Friday. The question is first on the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN].

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill as amended will be laid aside to be reported to the House with the understanding stated by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. PETERS. I desire that the report in this case shall be printed in the RECORD, and also all other reports on bills acted upon this evening, whether they are read or not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Kansas that the report in this case has already been printed in the RECORD.

Mr. PETERS. Then the order may be made as to the other reports.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. PERKINS. In order that there may be no misunderstanding, I wish to inquire whether we can secure action upon this bill next Friday except by ordering the previous question?

The CHAIRMAN. That is a matter rather to be determined when the committee rises and we get back into the House.

Mr. PERKINS. I make the suggestion now whether we shall order the previous question on these bills with the understanding that they will not be called up until next Friday.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair believes that is the understanding.

MRS. LAURA HENTIG.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2464) to increase the pension of Mrs. Laura Hentig; reported from the Committee on Pensions.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Laura Hentig, widow of Edmund C. Hentig, late a captain in the Sixth Cavalry, United States Army, and to pay her a pension at the rate of $50 per month, in lieu of that now allowed her.

The committee recommended the following amendment:

In line 7 strike out $50 and insert $30.

The report (by Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR) is as follows:

This case presents some strong reasons for an increase of pension, and we recommend that the bill do pass, after having been amended by striking out "fifty," in the seventh line, and inserting in place thereof "thirty."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

WILLIAM J. OWINGS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4097) for the relief of William J. Owings, reported by Mr. Zach. Taylor, from the Committee on Pensions.

The bill was read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri who introduced that bill is absent, and requests the present occupant of the chair to ask the committee to allow the bill to retain its place on the Calendar without prejudice.

Mr. PERKINS. Might not that bill be embraced in the arrangement we entered into a few minutes ago?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has stated the request of the gentleman from Missouri, and would prefer that that request should be acceded to.

There being no objection, the bill was passed over without prejudice

BETSEY MARTIN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4395) to grant a pension to Betsey Martin, reported by the Committee on Pensions.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Betsey Martin, widow of Jesse Martin, late of Capt. John Wheatley's company of Vermont militia, in the war of 1812 (her claim in the Pension Office was numbered 2668), said pension to commence from the date of the act of Congress granting pension to widows of soldiers who served in the war of 1812 with Great Britain.

The committee recommended the following amendment:

After the words "the war of 1812" strike out the following:
(Her claim in the Pension Office was numbered 2668), said pension to commence from the date of the act of Congress granting pension to widows of soldiers who served in the war of 1812 with Great Britain.

The report (by Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR) is as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred House bill No. 4395, recommend that it pass as amended by the committee, which amendment is as follows: Strike out all after the word "twelve," in the eighth line.

The amendment was adopted.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

BENJAMIN DUBACH.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 704) granting a pension to Benjamin Dubach; reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Benjamin Dubach, dependent father of Adolph Dubach, deceased, late a private in Captain Fleming's company, Tenth Kansas Volunteers, subject to the conditions and limitations of the pension laws.

The committee recommended the following amendment:

In line 6 strike out the words "Captain Fleming's company" and insert in lieu thereof "Company K."

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 704) granting a pension to Benjamin Dubach, submit the following report:

We find that claimant is the father of Adolph Dubach, who enlisted in Company F, Fifth Regiment Kansas Volunteers, subsequently Company K, Tenth Kansas, August 12, 1861, and who died in service February 23, 1862, of hemorrhage of the lungs. The evidence submitted shows that the father was a man of small means, carrying on a farm, in which he was aided and assisted by his son, a stout, robust boy of nearly eighteen years of age; that for a number of years the father supported himself by his own labor. He is now past the allotted age of three-score years and ten, unable to work, penniless, and dependent for support upon relatives.

The law requires the father to prove that he was unable to support himself and was dependent upon the son at the time of the latter's death. This is not claimed, as the father was then a strong and hearty man. He is now unable to perform manual labor, and is dependent. Congress has repeatedly decided, by the passage of similar acts, that present dependence, and not dependence at time of death of soldier, ought to govern in these cases.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

The amendment was adopted.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ELIZA A. WEEKS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2975) granting a pension to Eliza A. Weeks; reported by the Committee on Pensions.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and instructed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Eliza A. Weeks, widow of David P. Weeks, late a private in Captain Crosby's company, Second United States Dragoons, and pay her a pension of $12 per month.

Mr. PERKINS. Let the report be read in that case. It is a little different from the usual cases. It fixes the pension, without any amendment by the committee, at $12 a month.

Mr. BRADY. That is the law now, so far as the action of this House is concerned.

The report (by Mr. THOMPSON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2975) granting a pension to Eliza A. Weeks, submit the following report:

David P. Weeks was a member of Captain Ashby's company, Second United States Dragoons, and was wounded at the battle of Micanopy, Fla., in June, 1836. The ball which wounded him struck near the base of the left thumb, passing the entire length of his arm, shattering the bone throughout, and entered his body near the armpit and is supposed to have lodged near the heart. The arm was amputated. He died suddenly of heart disease on the 4th day of May, 1885, aged seventy-four years; and there is ground to believe that the disease of which he died was induced by his wound.

Eliza A. Weeks, his widow, was married to him in 1838, and lived with him until his death. During his lifetime he drew a pension of $30 per month. The bill provides a pension of $12 per month for his widow, and your committee recommend its passage.

Mr. PERKINS. As that is or will be in a few days the rate fixed in the general law, I move that the following words be stricken out:

To pay her a pension of $12 per month.

The amendment was adopted.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ROBERT H. ANDERSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar under the special order was the bill (S. 877) for the relief of Robert H. Anderson, of the State of Georgia; reported by the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That Robert H. Anderson, of the State of Georgia, is hereby relieved of all political disabilities imposed upon him by the third section of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

The report (by Mr. TUCKER) is as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary respectfully recommend that the bill (S. 877) for the relief of Robert H. Anderson, of the State of Georgia, be passed by the House of Representatives.

Mr. Robert H. Anderson's petition accompanies this report.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SILAS JAMES.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2793) granting a pension to Silas James; reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Silas James, late of Company D, Thirteenth Regiment of Michigan Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. WINANS) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2793) granting a pension to Silas James, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

Silas James enlisted February 27, 1864, as private in Company D, Thirteenth Michigan Volunteers, and was mustered out May 18, 1865. He applied for pension on account of rupture of both sides October 14, 1875, alleged to have been incurred while carrying timber for Government buildings at Chattanooga, Tenn., in April, 1864.

The records of the War Department show that claimant entered No. 14 general hospital, Nashville, Tenn., November 20, 1864, with inguinal hernia, and that he remained under treatment therefor, at different hospitals, until February 28, 1865.

The case has been in the hands of several special examiners to determine its merits. By this examination it is shown beyond a doubt that claimant was sound prior to and at date of his enlistment. From his own testimony it appears that at the time of the injury he was one of a detail under command of Captain Slayton, of the regiment employed in the erection of Government storehouses at Chattanooga, and that while assisting in carrying a heavy piece of timber it slipped and caught him across the groin. Claimant had been in service but a short time. The members of the company were nearly all strangers to him, and those who knew him were not present at the time of the injury; hence his inability to furnish the testimony of eye-witnesses.

Captain Slayton, upon being interviewed by the special examiner, failed to recall the circumstances under which claimant received the alleged injury. He has since filed an affidavit in which he states that he has given the case considerable thought recently, and by correspondence has refreshed his memory sufficiently to state that he was present at claimant's examination at the enrolling office and knows that he was sound, and further that he received an injury by the rolling of a heavy piece of timber while building Government warehouses at Chattanooga, for which affiant sent him to regimental hospital. Understood at the time that the injury was a rupture, but did not see it. Comrade Edwin Henderson testifies before the special examiner that he was not present at time of the incurrence of the disability, but saw the rupture about two weeks thereafter, and that claimant then wore a double truss.

Comrade McConnell testifies that claimant was injured in some way while employed under Captain Slayton, but can not now recall the nature or extent of the injury. Surgeon Goodale testifies that in the spring of 1864 he fitted a double truss on some one connected with the Engineer Brigade, but does not remember the name of the patient.

A number of claimant's comrades were interviewed by the several special examiners, but having had but little acquaintance with him for reasons heretofore stated, were unable to furnish additional information.

Medical examinations show a condition of the inguinal region of left side justifying a rating at one-half of total.

The case was returned to the Pension Office by Supervising Examiner Williams July 6, 1885, with the recommendation that the same be allowed. It was rejected, however, by the board of review, because the evidence was not deemed sufficient to show origin of disability in the service.

Your committee are of opinion that it is shown beyond any reasonable doubt that claimant was a sound man at enlistment; that during his service he received an injury which resulted in inguinal hernia, for which he was under treatment a considerable length of time, and that he has been disabled therefrom more or less ever since; and therefore report favorably on the bill, and ask that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ELIJAH W. PUTNEY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4346) granting a pension to Elijah W. Putney; reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Elijah W. Putney, late of Company I, Second Regiment of Minnesota Cavalry.

The report (by Mr. WINANS) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill H. R. 4346) granting a pension to Elijah W. Putney, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

Putney enlisted October 31, 1863, in Company I, Second Minnesota Cavalry, and served until mustered out, November 22, 1865. He filed application for pension November 8, 1877, on account of piles, alleged to have been contracted in August, 1864, while on a long and fatiguing march on the plains of Dakota.

There is no record evidence of the origin or existence of the disability in the service, neither is there any medical evidence of treatment therefor in service or since. In support of the claim we find the affidavits of the captain and two comrades of the claimant as to origin, and those of four neighbors and three members of his family to show soundness at enlistment and existence of piles at discharge, and continuous disability therefrom ever since. The captain testifies that during the latter part of his service claimant complained of piles, but affiant can not remember to what extent he was afflicted. Comrades Cater and Bundy testify that claimant was first attacked with piles on the second march of the command from the Missouri River to Fort Wadsworth, and that thereafter he was excused from duty much of the time, as he was wholly unfit for same. Affiants attribute the disability to long riding on horseback.

This claim was rejected by the Pension Office in 1881 on the ground of there being no record evidence at the War Department of the alleged disease, and because of the inability of the claimant to furnish medical evidence of its existence in the service or at date of his discharge.

This action was approved by the Secretary of the Interior June 13, 1883. In his letter of that date he says:

"There is evidence tending to prove prior soundness. There is also evidence tending to prove that appellant had piles in the service and at the time of his discharge."

And further on:

"The evidence considered together, while it tends to prove that the claimant suffered from piles while in the service, is not deemed to be sufficient to prove that the disease was contracted in the service or was due to his army life."

Since the affirmation by the Department of the rejection of the claim, the case has been specially examined. The original witnesses, as well as a number of other persons who have been intimately acquainted with claimant before and since his service, have been thoroughly examined, and a perusal of their testimony convinces your committee that claimant was free from piles at time of his enlistment, and that from long marches he did contract this disease, which has disabled him ever since.

Notwithstanding this cumulative and corroborative testimony, the claim has again been rejected on grounds similar to those given in the original rejection.

Your committee are of opinion that the evidence fully establishes the merit of the claim in spite of the absence of medical evidence, and being shown by the several medical examinations since 1878 to be disabled in a pensionable degree, believe claimant entitled to the relief asked for, and therefore report favorably on the bill, and ask that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

A. SCHUYLER SUTTON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1937) for increase of pension to A. Schuyler Sutton.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of A. Schuyler Sutton, late acting lieutenant-colonel of the Ninety-fifth Regiment of Ohio Volunteers, at the rate of $40 per month, in lieu of the pension he is now receiving, to take effect from and after the passage of this act.

Mr. ELLSBERRY. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. ELLSBERRY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1937) granting an increase of pension to A. Schuyler Sutton, submit the following report:

A bill for the relief of this claimant passed the Senate in the Forty-eighth Congress, but failed consideration in the House. After consideration your committee adopted the printed report of the Senate Committee on Pensions, Forty-eighth Congress, as follows:

"The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3370) to amend an act entitled 'An act granting a pension to A. Schuyler Sutton,' approved June 4, 1872, have examined the same, and report:

"This case was considered by this committee during the second session of the Forty-seventh Congress, and a favorable report made thereon, which is quoted in the report of the House committee (House Report No. 1212, Forty-eighth Congress, first session), as follows:

"'At the breaking out of the civil war A. Schuyler Sutton, who had seen honorable service during the war with Mexico, was an attorney-at-law in successful practice at Norwalk, Ohio. He enlisted as a private soldier in the Ninety-fifth Ohio, and having acquired a knowledge of military tactics during his former service, greatly assisted in the organization, drill, and discipline of the new regiment. There is satisfactory evidence that Sutton had received assurances from Governor Tod, of Ohio, that he should be commissioned as lieutenant-colonel of the regiment. It is certain that he was acting in that capacity when, at the battle of Richmond, Ky., on or about August 30, 1862, he received the wound for which he was originally pensioned. Owing to the fact that he had not been commissioned, the Pension Office rated him as a private soldier, and allowed him a pension at the rate of $8 per month, which was subsequently raised to $15. By an act of Congress, approved June 4, 1872, his pension was increased to $30 per month from that date.

"'Your committee believe that it would be an act of simple justice to this soldier to grant him a pension at this rate, dating from his discharge, deducting the amount received by him during the intervening period. His wound has had the effect of blasting his life. His jaws are so anchylosed as to prevent the mastication of solid food. The senses of sight and hearing are much impaired, and he is a constant sufferer from violent facial neuralgia. Being unable to open his mouth sufficiently, and by reason of disorganization of the soft and bony tissues occasioned by the wound, he is unable to employ the ordinary means of cleanliness, and his breath is consequently horribly offensive.

"'In the opinion of your committee the evidence in the case justifies the conclusion to which it has arrived, "that the disability for which he is now pensioned existed at the time of his discharge." We therefore report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass, so amended that A. Schuyler Sutton be pensioned at the rate of $40 per month from and after the passage of this act.'

"'This bill passed the House (Forty-seventh Congress) to date from passage of the act, and passed the Senate with an amendment to date from March 4, 1883. It was called up by the House for concurrence March 3, but on objection was laid over, and failed to become a law.'

"Your committee think it would be unwise to pass the bill as it came from the House, allowing pension from March 4, 1883, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill with amendments, granting pension at $40 per month in lieu of pension of $30 heretofore allowed, and that such increase take effect only from the passage of this act."

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ELIZABETH WARNER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5729) granting a pension to Elizabeth Warner.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Elizabeth Warner, widow of Harrison Warner, late a corporal of Company G, One hundred and eighty-second Regiment Ohio Volunteers, on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. ELLSBERRY) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5729) granting a pension to Elizabeth Warner, submit the following report:

We find that claimant is the widow of Harrison Warner, who was enrolled as a corporal on the 19th day of September, 1864, in Company G of the One hundred and eighty-second Regiment Ohio Volunteers, and who was discharged therefrom on the 7th day of July, 1865. That at the date of the death of said soldier, September 14, 1877, there was a claim pending in the Pension Office for invalid pension, on account of disease contracted in the service aforesaid. After the death of said soldier the claimant herein attempted to complete the claim, which was, on the 21st day of March, 1879, finally rejected on account of failure to prove treatment in Government hospital.

The evidence in this case shows that Harrison Warner, husband of claimant, was prior to his entry into the service a man of sound physical health, free from disease of any character, as shown by the testimony of Drs. R. W. Purdy and D. M. McConaughy, and Samuel Smith, Harvey Conner, A. M. Lang, L. L. Conner, and others who were neighbors of and intimately acquainted with him for many years previous to the war. While doing guard and other duty at Nashville, Tenn., on or about May 15, 1865, he became sick and unable to perform duty of any kind. The records show that he was not treated in general hospital, but from his own statements, corroborated by the testimony of his captain, lieutenants, and comrades, received treatment from Dr. Fear, who was a member of the same company, for what was then called "liver trouble" which continued during the remainder of the time he was in the service, and at the time of his discharge he was so feeble that his comrade, Samuel Kelly, had to procure a conveyance to convey him from the train to the point where the regiment was discharged. Capt. A. M. Lang and Lieut. L. L. Conner both give positive proof to his having disease of the liver from on or about May 15, 1865, up to and after his discharge from the service. Dr. D. M. McConaughy, who was the family physician prior to his entry into the service, testifies that he was a man of sound health at the time of his enlistment. On his return from the service, he was, on the 25th day of July, 1865, called upon to visit him at his home, and found him suffering with chronic hepatitis. He continuously treated him from that date up to the year 1870, with no perceptible improvement, his disease resulting in jaundice, entirely disabling him for the performance of manual labor.

Dr. R. A. Stephenson, now United States examining surgeon, testifies that in January, 1870, he was called upon to give treatment to Mr. Warner, and found him suffering from chronic hepatitis; continued to treat him for said disease until he died in September, 1877. At no time during his illness was he able to perform manual labor, in consequence of the disease aforesaid.

Dr. John Shackelford, United States examining surgeon, residing at Maysville, Ky., certifies that on June 17, 1874, he carefully examined Mr. Warner, late a corporal in Company G, One hundred and eighty-second Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and found him permanently disabled with chronic enlargement of the liver and sympathetic irritation of lungs. The soldier died, leaving the claimant, his widow, and three helpless little children, without means of support. In our opinion this claim should have been allowed by the Pension Department, as the evidence is full, positive, and clear that the disease was contracted in the service and caused the death of the soldier. This is one of the cases requiring the attention of Congress and deserving immediate consideration.

In view of all the evidence in this case, your committee recommend that the accompanying bill do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM H. H. GILLESPIE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1344) granting a pension to William H. H. Gillespie.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William H. H. Gillespie, formerly of Company I, First Regiment Missouri State Militia.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1344) granting a pension to William H. H. Gillespie, submit the following report:

Your committee find that claimant enlisted August 1, 1863, in Company I, First Regiment Missouri State Militia, and was discharged October 29, 1864, on account of amputation of the left arm. Application was made for a pension in 1865, but was rejected on the ground that the wound resulting in amputation was not received in line of duty.

The facts in this case, as established by a special examination ordered by the Pension Department, are as follows:

On the morning of the 1st of August, 1864, claimant, returning from picket duty to his quarters, found his comrades eating watermelons, and was invited to join them, which he did. The men had been amusing themselves by throwing the rinds at each other. Claimant, joining in the sport, threw a piece of rind at Comrade Davidson, who quickly dodged, and the missile struck William J. Fuller, another comrade. Fuller, being a man of violent temper, became at once incensed, and commenced an attack upon the claimant with stones and bricks. Claimant at once retreated to an upper room of the building in which they were quartered, and secreted himself. Remaining there for a short time, until he supposed his comrade's rage had passed away, he ventured out, when Fuller sprang upon him, stabbing him in the left arm, inflicting a wound which made amputation of the arm necessary nine days after. The special examiner, in his report, says:

"All the witnesses agree that Fuller was ill-tempered and easily vexed; that claimant was a mild, peaceable man, and neither of them drinking liquor, and that Gillespie was in sport, and fully believe all Gillespie did was in sport, and he never once anticipated the dire result, and dearly has he paid the penalty. He is a very poor man, and bears a good character in the community."

It would seem that this claimant received this wound through no fault of his, that he had violated no order, and that a pension should have been allowed him by the Department. If the Government accepts into service an insane man, it ought to be held responsible for the acts of that man.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

JAMES B. RUSSELL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5692) granting a pension to James B. Russell.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of James B. Russell, late first lieutenant of Company H, Second Regiment East Tennessee Cavalry, and pay him a pension from and after the passage of this act.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5692) for the relief of James B Russell, submit the following report:

We find that claimant was first lieutenant of Company H, Second Tennessee Cavalry, enlisting October 10, 1861, and resigning March 9, 1863; that in 1871 he filed an application for a pension, alleging weak eyes and weakness of breast. This application was rejected on the ground that he could not prove the disability to be due to the service. The certificate of disability given by the surgeon of the regiment February 26, 1863, reads:

"I have carefully examined J. B. Russell, first lieutenant of Company H, Second Tennessee Cavalry, and find that he is suffering from chronic bronchitis and dysentery. He has been unable for duty for over a month; his constitution is so impared and broken down, and being now in his forty-ninth year, I am of opinion that he will not again be fit for public service."

James Baker, Elizabeth Baker, and Lieut. S. D. Best testify to claimant's soundness at enlistment. The latter testifies that Lieutenant Russell was obliged to leave the service on account of his eyes. R. Long and J. Bearont testify as to origin in service and treatment by the regimental surgeon.

Dr. A. L. Canich, regimental surgeon, testifies to treating claimant for sore eyes in February, 1863. Capt. S. P. Rowan testifies to claimant's discharge for disability of eyes and back. Several witnesses, including two physicians, testify as to existence of disability at discharge and continuance since. The examining surgeon at Newtonia, Mo., reports in 1871 that he is blind in right eye, the vision of left eye is dim, and suffering from chronic bronchitis. The examining surgeon, Pineville, in 1874, reports the eyes the same as the other surgeon, but finds no bronchitis. The same surgeon, in 1882, reports his eyes the same, and says he is very much emaciated, weighing only 112 pounds.

The evidence shows him to have been intensely loyal to the Government and very active in its support.

He is now seventy-two years of age, poor, and unable to do anything for his support.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

HENRY BARR.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2179) granting a pension to Henry Barr.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Henry Barr, father of Jacob Barr, late a private in Company A, One hundred and third Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, and pay him a pension from the 25th day of April, 1885.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

At the end of the bill strike out all after the word "volunteers."

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was submitted the bill (H. R. 2179) granting a pension to Henry Barr, have considered the same, and submit the following report:

Henry Barr is the father of Jacob Barr, late of Company A, One hundred and third Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers.

By act of Congress Susannah Barr, mother of Jacob Barr, drew a pension of $8 per month from July 5, 1884, to April 25, 1885, which is the date of her death, and it is now proposed by this bill to continue her pension to her husband, Henry Barr.

As the report submitted by the Committee on Invalid Pensons to the Forty-eighth Congress embodies the facts connected with present claimant, your committee adopt it as their own, attach it hereto, and recommend the passage of the bill with the following amendment: Strike out all after the word "volunteer," in line 8.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5821) granting a pension to Mrs. Susannah Barr, respectfully report:

That Susannah Barr is the mother of Samuel Barr, who enlisted in the military service of the United States as a private in Company G, One hundred and third Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, December 1, 1861, and died in the military prison at Andersonville, Ga., July 8, 1864; also of Jacob Barr, who died from wounds received in the service of the United States in hospital in Philadelphia, Pa.

This claim was rejected by the Pension Office May 3, 1882, on the ground that claimant was not dependent at the date of soldiers' deaths.

It appears from the testimony of Dr. Ross, United States examining surgeon, of Clarion County, Pennsylvania, that the husband of claimant is a feeble old man, over seventy-four years of age, and is suffering from a stroke of palsy of the left side, and has no use of the left arm, and but little use of the left leg; walks with difficulty, and is disqualified from the performance of any kind of manual labor.

Dr. Samuel D. Meals testifies, February 2, 1881:

"That he has been claimant's family physician since 1863, and especially since 1864; that the husband was not able to follow usual occupation as a farmer at that time; that in the years 1866, 1867, 1868, 1869, 1870, and every year since to the present time, he has noticed him failing, and July 11, 1876, he had a stroke of paralysis, since which he has not been able to perform any labor."

It appears from the evidence in this case that claimant's husband was the owner of a farm in Perry Township, Clarion County, Pennsylvania, which he sold in 1864, though the deed was not recorded until 1866, for $6,234, and that

September 29, 1865, he purchased three acres of land in Callensburg, in same county and State, paying therefor $900. He owned no farm after the purchase of the property in Callensburg. The house and lot was assessed at $325 up to 1880. The property owned in Callensburg is shown by a copy of the notice of sale to have been sold on execution to satisfy judgments against husband of claimant and other parties. The personal property of claimant's husband is shown to have never exceeded $300, and the proceeds of the sale of the farm, in 1864 was exhausted in the payment of debts; the deceased soldier contributed of his earnings prior to and during his military service to the support of this claimant, who is now entirely without means of support, and has been since the death of the soldier.

The amendment was agreed to.

There being no objection the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARY MERRILL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4631) granting a pension to Mary Merrill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary Merrill, widow of Alexander Merrill, late a private in Company L, Twelfth Tennessee Cavalry.

The report (by Mr. O'HARA) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4631) granting a pension to Mary Merrill, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

Claimant's husband enlisted as a private in Company L, Twelfth Regiment Tennessee Cavalry, April 19, 1864, and was discharged July 14, 1865. Died January 23, 1869. The soldier at the time of his death was a pensioner of the United States for disability contracted in the service of the United States and in the line of duty. Widow's claim was rejected on the ground that bronchitis, of which her husband died, was not the effect of disability incurred in the service and for which he was pensioned. The record of the Surgeon-General's Office shows that soldier was recommended for discharge at post hospital, Leavenworth, Kans., by reason of chronic hepatitis and varicose veins contracted since his last enlistment. Unfit for Veteran Reserve Corps. Disability one-half.

Officer's certificate of disability shows that soldier was "disabled on the march from Nashville, Tenn., to Tullahoma, Tenn., in the month of June, 1864. His horse fell with him, and seriously injured him, since which date he has not been able to do duty as a soldier, and that he is disabled in the left hip and breast." This certificate is signed by J. C. Boyer, captain Company L, Twelfth Tennessee Cavalry.

A. P. Calaher, colonel commanding post, states in certificate of disability for discharge, that "this soldier has been a willing and obedient soldier, but has been afflicted for a long time on account of chronic hepatitis and varicose veins, contracted since his last enlistment."

Dr. W. D. Whitted, a reputable physician of Henderson County, North Carolina, testifies, under oath, that "he was personally acquainted with widow's husband, having attended him as his physician in his last illness; that he died of bronchitis contracted while in the United States Army; that soldier was always a devoted adherent to the Union cause, and during the war passed through the rebel lines and enlisted in the Federal Army."

In view of all the testimony of record in this case, regardless of the physician who attended soldier in his last illness, and whose testimony strongly corroborates the record testimony, your committee can easily trace the soldier's cause of death to the disability incurred while in the service of the United States and in the line of duty. They therefore unanimously recommend the passage of the bill granting the widow the pension she so richly deserves in her old age and great poverty.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ROXANA V. ROWLEY AND SON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5306) granting a pension to Roxana V. Rowley and son.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Roxana V. Rowley, of Winona, Minn., widow of the late Franklin Rowley, first lieutenant of Company D, One hundred and ninety-fourth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and her son under sixteen years old.

The amendments reported by the committee were read, as follows:

At the end of the bill strike out the words "and her son under sixteen years old."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill granting a pension to Roxana V. Rowley."

The report (by Mr. O'HARA) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5306) granting a pension to Roxana V. Rowley and son, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

Roxana V. Rowley is the widow of Franklin V. Rowley, late first lieutenant Company D, One hundred and ninety-fourth Begiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry.

Claimant's husband enlisted in the service of the United States February, 1865; resigned May, 1865; made application for pension April, 1880, and his claim was rejected. Soldier died September 20, 1881, of chronic disease of the liver, causing great emaciation, obstinate constipation, and jaundice.

Widow's claim filed May 8, 1882, and rejected on the ground that the disease of which the soldier died, "liver disease," existed prior to and at the time of his enlistment into the service of the United States, as shown by medical testimony on file in the case, and that the report from the War Department fails to show that soldier was sick during enlistment.

The medical testimony alluded to as on file in the case is that of Doctor Sisson, who states that in 1865—probably about September, 1865—he visited and attended claimant's husband, who was then suffering from a severe and protracted sickness, considered disease of the liver, accompanied and attended with all the painful symptoms diagnostic of bilious colic—pain, tenderness, enlargement, cramping in the right hypochondriac region and of the duodenum, jaundice, and constipation. The sufferings were severe, and continued for weeks and months, with occasional intervals of improvement, to be followed by relapses, emaciation, debility, and inability to labor. Affiant can not state the condition of soldier's health at the time of enlistment, nor while in the service, though claimant stated to affiant his health was bad while in the Army. In a private letter to the Commissioner of Pensions, bearing date of July, 1883, Doctor Sisson states that he treated soldier in 1854 for dyspepsia.

R. B. Carter, late lieutenant of soldier's regiment, testifies that he was well acquainted with soldier at the time of his enlistment as lieutenant of Company D, and that he was then a sound and healthy man, and was present when he was sworn in; and that while in the service of the United States and in the line of duty, during the month of March, 1865, at Charlestown, in West Virginia, where no tents of sufficiency were furnished, and being just called from home and exposed to cold, sleet, and snow, soldier contracted a severe cold, which unfitted him ever after for duty as a well man, and finally he succumbed to the disease and resigned on account of his disability. Affiant was acting as adjutant of the regiment at the time, and that the facts stated by him were acquired by a personal knowledge while acting as such adjutant.

Robert H. Brewster testifies that he is at present (December, 1885) judge of the probate court of Meigs County, Ohio. That he was well acquainted with claimant's husband, who kept a store in the village of Danville, about 2 miles from residence of affiant, during the years 1853, 1854, and 1855, and saw him frequently up to the time of his enlistment. That during all the period of his (affiant's) acquaintance with soldier he attended to his business, and affiant never knew or heard of any disability, but regarded soldier as an able-bodied man.

David W. De Lay also testifies to soundness of soldier prior to enlistment.

S. H. Guthrie and James McFarland, in a joint affidavit, say that they were for over thirty years well acquainted with claimant's husband before he enlisted; that they lived in the neighborhood where he lived for a long time; saw him weekly; he was a mechanic and did their work. That they are fully satisfied that at the time he entered the Army he was a healthy man, and that they never knew or heard anything to the contrary, and that he was a good, sober, moral man.

Dr. Franklin Staples, who treated claimant's husband, also testifies as to his condition before his death, being similar to that at death described by Dr. Sisson, who treated him shortly after he returned home from the Army.

Dr. J. Q. A. Vale also treated soldier for lung trouble early in the year 1866.

Benjamin Sisson also testifies that he knew soldier for five years immediately preceding his enlistment, and that he was a sound, healthy man at that time, and that soldier returned home sick and suffering in 1865.

A large amount of lay testimony, showing soundness of soldier prior to his enlistment and his enfeebled condition at the time of his discharge, was produced. The physician who treated him shortly after his discharge described quite vividly his condition, and stated that he knew nothing about claimant's condition at the time of his entering the service of the United States, save that he (soldier) told him that his health was bad while in the Army.

From a careful examination of this case it is shown that the claim was rejected on account of the private letter of Dr. Sisson, in which he stated that he treated soldier for dyspepsia in 1854. Your committee can not indorse a rejection based on such an unfair and, to say the least, unsupported statement; and they are of opinion that widow's claim to a pension has been sufficiently established. They therefore recommend the passage of the bill, after amending the same by striking out all after the word "infantry," in line 8 of the bill; also by striking out the words "and son" from its title.

The amendments were agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

DARIUS M. SEAMAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1279) granting a pension to Darius M. Seaman.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Darius M. Seaman, late of Company C, One hundred and fiftieth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. O'HARA) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1279) granting a pension to Darius M. Seaman, having had the same under consideration, submit the following report:

The claimant was a private in Company C, One hundred and fiftieth Pennsylvania Volunteers. On the 20th day of December, 1862, he received a gunshot wound in the left forearm, said wound causing a withering of the arm, so that it is now very nearly lifeless and perfectly useless. The said wound was received by accident. While standing resting on his gun it was accidentally discharged, the ball lodging in said arm.

The ball was extracted, taking out of the arm about four inches of the bone, which greatly disabled claimant, and incapacitated him from manual labor a greater part of his time.

The claim was rejected on the ground that said wound was not received in the line of duty and in the service of the United States.

Lieut. Col. H. S. Huidekoper, of claimant's regiment, states that soldier was with his company (C, One hundred and fiftieth Pennsylvania Volunteers) in the war of 1861, and was accidentally wounded December 20, 1862, by the discharge of his own gun, the ball passing through the left forearm, for which he was honorably discharged. This testimony is further corroborated by H. H. Davis, lieutenant of claimant's company, who testifies from a personal knowledge of the circumstances.

Your committee are of the opinion that soldier was in the line of duty at the time of receiving the gunshot wound in the left forearm; and following an uninterrupted line of precedents in this class of cases by Congress, recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ELIJAH P. HENSLEY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1707) granting a pension to Elijah P. Hensley.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Elijah P. Hensley, late of Company K, Third Regiment North Carolina Mounted Infantry.

The report (by Mr. O'HARA) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1707) granting a pension to Elijah P. Hensley, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

The claimant was admitted to a pension of $4 per month on the rolls of the Raleigh (N. C.) agency, December 17, 1868, commencing August 8, 1865, and paid to include March 3, 1877; was dropped from the roll August 3, 1877, on the ground that the pensioner was not in the service and line of duty when wounded, as shown by the report of Special Agent Ragsdale, dated May 31, 1877.

Claimant was a member of Company K, Third North Carolina Mounted Volunteers, having enlisted in said company in February, 1865, and was wounded at Indian Creek, Yancey County, North Carolina, March, 1865, having been cut off from his command in Tennessee, on House Creek, near Greeneville, Tenn. At the time claimant was wounded he was detailed by Colonel Kirk to join T. O. and J. W. Guthrie and others to get rations for themselves; that they returned within one hour and a half, but found that the command had left. The claimant with others then started for a point of safety in North Carolina, and to join their command, when overtaken and shot by the enemy, and wounded as alleged.

It appears that some time in 1877, owing to causes not material to this report, information was furnished the Pension Office that said claimant was not wounded in the line of duty. On this point there is a conflict of testimony on the time of claimant reaching his command, but none as to his being shot by rebels while in search of provisions for his command as he was detailed to do.

Your committee are of the opinion that claimant is entitled to a pension, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JAMES N. HAIR.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4977) granting a pension to James N. Hair.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of James N. Hair, late a private in Company I, First Battalion Minnesota Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. O'HARA) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4977) granting a pension to James N. Hair, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

The claimant alleged that while in the line of duty on the 15th of June, 1865, he was attacked with measles en route between Chicago and Pittsburgh, and was left in hospital at Harrisburg, Pa., and from thence to Little York, Pa., in Government hospital, where he was discharged, and that said disease resulted in nearly the entire destruction of the sight of both eyes.

Claimant enlisted on the 12th day of April, 1865, as a private in Company I, First Battalion Minnesota Volunteers, and was discharged June 15, 1865.

The claim was rejected on the ground that the disease of the eyes did not originate in service, and medical referee does not admit that same is the result of measles.

The record of the Adjutant-General's Office shows claimant "present May and June, 1865; absent, left sick at Harrisburg, Pa." Company was stationed at Chicago, Ill., April 30, 1865. The command to which the company belonged was transferred from the Army of the Potomac June 10, 1865, to the Army of Tennessee. Left Army of the Potomac at Munson's Hill, Va., June 16, 1865; joined Army of Tennessee at Louisville, Ky., June 21, 1865. He was mustered out on detached muster-out roll June 15, 1865, at United States general hospital, York, Pa., with remark, "Entered hospital May 15, 1865."

Claimant swears that while en route with his company from Fort Snelling, Minn., to Washington, D. C., he was taken sick with measles, and left at Harrisburg, Pa., on or about May 10, 1865, and transferred from there to Little York, Pa., about May 16, 1865; that he is unacquainted with the names of the attending surgeons of either hospital, and is, therefore, unable to furnish the evidence in regard to treatment for measles, unless it is shown by hospital records.

E. D. Cooper, orderly sergeant Company I, First Minnesota Volunteers, testifies that he was and is now well acquainted with James N. Hair, who served as private in Company I; that on trip from Saint Paul, Minn., to Washington, D. C., in the month of May, 1865, and while in the line of duty, said Hair was taken sick, and left at Harrisburg, Pa., in hospital.

J. B. Bamcord, late first lieutenant Company I, First Minnesota Volunteers, testifies that he is acquainted with claimant; that claimant contracted the measles while in the line of duty; that on or about April 25, 1865, while in camp at Fort Snelling, two men were taken sick with measles, and that said James N. Hair was exposed thereto, and that on or about May 9, 1865, while en route from Fort Snelling to Washington, D. C., and while in Chicago, Ill., the said claimant was taken sick with measles; and on or about May 12, 1865, was left in hospital, sick with same disease, at Harrisburg, Pa.; and about one week thereafter transferred from Harrisburg to Little York, Pa.; and on June 15, 1865, was mustered out of service,

There is an abundance of evidence showing that claimant was sound at the time of his enlistment; and as to his having sore eyes on his return home from the service, in August, 1865, J. A. Elleson and Norman Hicks both testified that claimant returned from the Army in August, 1865, so nearly blind that he could scarcely recognize any one—eyes badly inflamed, and discharged for nearly six months; after this, appeared to get some better, so that he could move around without a guide. At the time of his return he said his sore eyes was the result of the measles—caught cold. From discharge to the present he has been two-thirds disabled. V. C. Whitcomb testifies that he was a member of Company G, First Minnesota Volunteers; was sent to Little York Hospital in Pennsylvania, and he became acquainted with claimant, who was being treated for sore eyes. Claimant told him the disease was the result of measles, and at the time of his discharge, in June, 1865, claimant was almost blind.

Dr. W. B. Steere, medical examiner, states:

"In the examination of James N. Hair for original pension, I stated that the disease of the eye had the appearance of being the result of staphyloma. I can not account for the peculiar appearance of the opacity (leucoma) in any other way. It is not like the nebula or leucoma arising from corneitis. It is different from anything I have met or seen described. It looks as if there had been a partial staphyloma of the cornea. Viewed under a magnifying glass there are several points which look like cicatrices from puncture. On the whole, I think there is considerable doubt about it being a direct result of measles, although that may have been a remote cause of the opthalmia."

E. C. Cross, another examining surgeon, states:

"The applicant has cicatrices covering one-half lower side of each pupil, that does seriously interfere with vision; I can not say whether permanent or not, for I do not know what a skillful oculist might do toward removing them. They appear as if soreness might have been produced by measles. The scars on his eyes disable him fully one-half. I can get no evidence of syphilis after a most careful inspection of the applicant naked. He says he had measles in the Army."

The medical examiner will not state positively that condition of eyes may not be traced to effect of measles for which claimant was treated in the hospital. Your committee believe that the soldier is entitled to the doubt, should any exist, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CHARLES WYANT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5705) granting a pension to Charles Wyant.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Charles Wyant, late of Company K, One hundred and fiftieth Regiment New York Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. PINDAR) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred House bill 5705, beg leave to submit the following report:

That the claimant, Charles Wyant, enlisted September 5, 1862, in Company K, One hundred and fiftieth Regiment New York Volunteers, and was discharged June 22, 1865.

His application for pension was filed June 22, 1885, and was rejected January 25, 1886, upon the ground that "there is no record of alleged rupture and alleged inability of claimant to furnish any proof of origin or existence of alleged rupture in service or any definite proof of its existence at discharge."

Claimant testifies as follows:

That he is unable to comply with the requirements of the Pension Office for the reasons that he can not furnish the testimony of any physician or physicians who have attended him since the date of his discharge from the military service of the United States, showing the history and degree of the alleged rupture during each year, the dates and duration of all treatment administered and a full description of the disability described in all its phases owing to the fact that after his discharge and after his return home he applied for medical and surgical treatment to Dr. Isaac F. Van Vlich, a physician and surgeon then practicing in the village of Rhinebeck, N. Y., and said physician pronounced his disability to be a rupture, and placed upon this claimant such a truss as is usually worn in such cases of physical disability, which he has continued to wear around his body ever since that time till the present period, renewing the same from time to time when necessary; that the said Isaac F. Van Vlich died about ten or twelve years ago, and he has never been treated by any other physician or surgeon since that time, but has treated himself as best he could by following out the instructions given him by his late physician; nor was he ever treated or placed in any hospital while in said military service; and further declares that previous to the 20th day of February, 1865, he was detailed as blacksmith for the brigade in the corps to which his regiment was attached, and marching along with the wagon-train the said train was surprised and attacked by the Sixth Georgia Confederate Cavalry, at Fayetteville, N. C., and claimant was severely struck by a cavalryman with the butt-end of a large carbine rifle in his private parts, below his stomach, and the next morning thereafter the said rupture showed itself by a black and blue bunch appearing and protruding from the abdominal cavity, and it has so continued to protrude therefrom, growing worse and larger each year until in consequence he can not perform more than one-half day's labor; that he was taken prisoner by the confederate forces at Fayetteville, at said attack, and placed in prison at Raleigh, N. C., and after a short time was removed to Salisbury prison, and then removed to Danville prison, and finally confined in Libby prison, Virginia, and after his exchange he went to Parole Camp, Maryland, and remained there until his discharge, and was not able to rejoin his regiment."

James M. Sheak, sergeant of Company F, One hundred and fiftieth Regiment New York Volunteers, testifies that he has been acquainted with claimant thirty years past; that claimant was taken prisoner by the Sixth Georgia Confederate Cavalry at Fayetteville, N. C., February 20, 1865, and that claimant was a sound and able-bodied man at and prior to enlistment.

Archibald L. Ostrum, second lieutenant Company K, One hundred and fiftieth Regiment New York Volunteers, testifies substantially the same as Sheak, and that the claimant was a sound and able-bodied man at and prior to enlistment, as far as he knows; and that he has no interest in this claim.

Robert J. L. Marshall and Alonzo C. Noxon testify that they have been well and personally acquainted with claimant for thirty years past, and that before he enlisted he was a perfectly sound and healthy man, and never complained of rupture or any other disability of their knowledge or belief; that he could do a full day's work day after day without intermission, but since his discharge from the military service he has complained of rupture, and left his work at blacksmith shop, complaining of great pain.

John J. Burch testifies that he is a blacksmith by trade, and he has had claimant in his employment for the past six or seven years, and claimant has always complained of rupture, and has frequently been obliged to leave his work and go to his home for relief from the pain caused by said disability; that he can not do more than one-half the work of a person in sound physical health, and when claimant performs much hard labor one day he is unable to work for one or several days thereafter.

Dr. Cornelius S. Van Etten testifies that he has never been called upon to treat claimant for rupture, or knew he had rupture until the said claimant applied to him to make a physical examination on this 17th day of October, 1885, and that said Wyant had a complete rupture or hernia, and that he was wearing a truss therefor.

The examining board at Kingston state that claimant is ruptured in right side and wears a truss, and is entitled to a one-half rating.

The committee deem the proof sufficient to entitle claimant to a pension, and recommend that the bill do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. MARGARET A. JACOBY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5021) granting a pension to Mrs. Margaret A. Jacoby.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Margaret A. Jacoby, widow of Sandford Jacoby, late of Company F, Seventieth New York Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. PINDAR) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5021) granting a pension to Mrs. Margaret A. Jacoby, submit the following report:

That Sandford Jacoby, the husband of the claimant, enlisted April 20, 1861, in Company F, Seventieth Regiment New York Volunteers, and was discharged July 1, 1864. The soldier's claim for pension was submitted for admission December 1, 1884, and approved for total deafness and chronic diarrhea, granting him a pension for $5 per month, commencing July 1, 1864, and ending September 7, 1875, date of soldier's disappearance. The widow's application was filed July 17, 1885, and rejected by the Department August 6, 1885, upon the ground that fact, date, and cause of soldier's death not shown and inability of applicant to furnish the necessary proof.

The basis of the claim is that while the soldier was engaged in the battle of Gettysburg, Pa., July 2, 1863, by reason of concussion from discharge of artillery, he was rendered almost totally deaf, and also contracted chronic diarrhea, by reason of which he was totally disabled for military duty; that he never recovered, but has been totally deaf in right ear ever since, and afflicted with chronic diarrhea.

Claimant testifies that when her husband returned from the Army in 1864 he was suffering from chronic diarrhea and deafness contracted while in the service; that while residing with deponent at Greene, Chenango County, New York, on or about the 7th day of September, 1875, he left and has never been heard from since; that she made diligent search and inquiry for him and that she has been unable to ascertain or learn anything about him, and that she verily believes he is now deceased; that he had been sick for a week before he left and had done no work; that he was despondent by reason of his said disabilities and did not seem to be in his right mind; that he was not then able to support deponent, and that she has not received any support from him since.

Dr. Charles M. Lawrence, of Port Jervis, N. Y., testifies that he treated soldier upon his discharge and return from the Army for chronic diarrhea and deafness, and has treated him at frequent intervals for said disabilities up to 1873, when he removed to Greene, Chenango County, New York, and that said diseases were likely to prove fatal.

Dr. Marcus M. Wood, of Greene, Chenango County, New York, testifies that he treated soldier for deafness and chronic diarrhea at intervals from 1873 to 1875, and that the diarrhea laid him up about half the time until the summer of 1875, when he left town. He was then suffering from both of those disabilities, which probably have proven fatal before this date (August 20, 1883). Have no doubt that his complaints were caused by exposure while in the service.

Jane Brown testifies that she is a sister of soldier's wife; has always lived near her said sister during her residence at Port Jervis, N. Y., which has been continuous since her marriage, except for six or seven years, when she lived at Greene, Chenango County, New York, during which time she was deserted by her husband, and since that time her sister has resided at Port Jervis, N. Y.

Adela Cunningham, Murates Beach, Henry P. Bates, and Lucius P. Clark all testify that the said Sanford Jacoby disappeared in 1875, and have never seen him since.

The decision of the Secretary of the Interior, regarding the presumption of death, is as follows:

"That cases arise in which it is impossible to obtain positive proof of the soldier's death, but the presumption of his death from causes connected with the service is so strong as to justify the allowance of a claim for pension made on behalf of his widow, children, or dependent relatives.

* * * * * * *

"The presumption of common law is that a person who has been absent and not been heard from for seven years is dead. The presumption may properly be accepted under the pension law, and if, when last heard from, soldier was suffering from serious disease contracted or injury received in the line of duty in the service, it may be presumed that his death occurred from such cause if there is nothing in the circumstances to rebut such presumption."

Your committee are of the belief that the proofs, with the fact that the soldier has not been paid his pension since the date of his disappearance, justify the presumption that the soldier is dead, and that his death was the result of disease contracted while in service in the line of duty, and recommend that the bill do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

LIEUT. JOSEPH PROST.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5307) granting a pension to Lieut. Joseph Prost.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the limitations of the pension laws, the name of Joseph Prost, late a lieutenant of Company E, Fifty-fifth Regiment New York Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. PIDCOCK) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5307) granting a pension to Lieut. Joseph Prost, submit the following report:

The soldier states that he enlisted August 28, 1861, as orderly sergeant in Company E, Fifty-fifth Regiment New York Volunteers, and was promoted to be a second lieutenant of said company October 1, 1861. In his declaration for pension he alleges that he was injured in back, while marching with his regiment, by falling down the embankment of a creek and striking his back across a tree and injuring his spine, at Yorktown, Va., on or about August 10, 1862.

The claim was submitted for admission June 14, 1883, by the examiner at the Pension Office, but rejected on report of the special examiner of the office in the field, to whom the case had been referred for personal examination, on the ground of claimant's inability to prove that he incurred his alleged injury in the service.

The alleged disability having been contracted over six months after soldier was mustered into service, by rulings of the Pension Office, prior soundness is presumed and admitted.

The following is a copy of the surgeon's certificate on which the soldier was honorably discharged September 16, 1862:

"This is to certify that Second Lieut. Joseph Prost, of Company E, Fifty-fifth Regiment New York State Militia, has been carefully examined by me, and found him actually unfit for duty, and now affirmed, that he has by the fatigues of the last campaign become so weak that he is unable to follow his regiment, and will remain for some time unable to perform his duties.

"F. PETARD,
"Surgeon Fifty-fifth Regiment New York Volunteers.

"SEPTEMBER 17, 1862."

Francis A. Schilling, first lieutenant Company H, Fifty-fifth Regiment New York Volunteers, testifies that he was well acquainted with the claimant, who was at the same time second lieutenant of Company E, same regiment; that on the 25th day of August, 1862, while in active service at Yorktown, Va., said claimant, while in charge of the picket guard, and in the act of crossing a stream, by walking a log lying across the same, slipped and fell, striking his back upon a knot or projection on said log, and was thereby severely injured, and was brought into camp by one of said picket guard; that in September of the same year the claimant was duly discharged, by order No. 248, made by Major General Halleck, because of the injury above mentioned.

In reply to office letter of January 23, 1883, he states, that the facts relating to the injury received by Lieut. Joseph Prost are correctly stated in his former declaration, and that he knows of his personal knowledge that in the middle of August, 1862, he, while in charge of the picket guard, fell down, struck and hurt his back on a log, in attempting to walk across a creek; that thereafter, and by reason of said injury, he was unable to do any actual service, and was consequently discharged; that he has seen claimant many times since his discharge, and knows that he is still suffering from said injury.

Before the special examiner, Mr. Schilling testified to the receipt of the injury to back by Lieutenant Prost, stating that he was informed of the manner in which it occurred from men who were with Prost at the time, by Dr. Petard, who told him Prost was unable to march, and he had put him (Prost) in an ambulance, and from Prost himself.

Capt. John H. Tissot, of claimant's company and regiment, testified before the special examiner that he got leave of absence July 12, 1862, leaving Lieutenant Prost in command. Returning to the company at Yorktown, Va., August 1, 1862, he found Prost complaining of general weakness and claimed that he had been injured, and did not think Prost performed any regular duty after he (Tissot) rejoined the company. He states further that it is his opinion that Prost contracted disability in the service.

Several other witnesses were sworn whose testimony is very much similar to that given by Captan Tissot, showing that claimant was weak and sickly in service, and claimed it resulted from the alleged fall, but state they have no personal knowledge of the contraction of the disability.

Dr. Isidore P. Latour testifies that he has attended and prescribed for the claimant very frequently since 1869; that he has been and is now affected in the dorsal regions of the spinal column with very severe pains, extending downward to the lower extremities, assuming the form of double sciatica, accompanied with numbness, rendering him wholly unfit to perform manual labor; and from personal examinations and the history of the case, believes the injury was incurred as stated by claimant.

Dr. Henry A. Hopper testifies that he has been a practicing physician since 1847; that he has recollection of the surgical treatment, some time between 1866 and 1869, by his father, Abraham Hopper, M. D. (now deceased), upon Lieut. Joseph Prost, for an injury to his spine, said to have been received in the United States service; that in conversation with his father he has understood it to have been the opinion of his father that the injury to claimant was permanent, and would likely disqualify him from engaging in manual labor.

From testimony of persons intimately acquainted with him it is shown that the claimant on his return home was in a very critical condition; that he was attended by a Dr. Nicholas Hamerer (now dead) for a number of years for his injury to his back and spine; and that he has been a constant sufferer from his disability and unable to perform continuous labor.

Dr. T. B. Hood, of the Pension Office, June 25, 1883, reported:

"I am of the opinion that claimant has been disabled since discharge by cause alleged."

The claim was probably rejected because the proof of disability was general, and not from eye-witnesses to the injury.

Your committee, considering that from the testimony of officers of the regiment and the certificate of the surgeon it appears the claimant was weak and sick in service, are of the opinion that the disability was contracted there, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ELIZABETH CROWLEY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5332) granting a pension to Elizabeth Crowley.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Elizabeth Crowley, widow of Thomas Crowley, late of Company G, Ninth Regiment New Jersey Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. PIDCOCK) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5332) granting a pension to Elizabeth Crowley, submit the following report:

The husband of claimant was a pensioner at the rate of $8 per month for gunshot wound of left shoulder until his death, January 26, 1882. The widow, in her declaration for pension, alleged that death from softening of the brain resulted from the gunshot wound received in the service, and for which the soldier drew pension.

The Pension Office rejected her claim on the ground that death from softening of the brain, and consequent paralysis, was not the result of wound of left shoulder.

Dr. William Hackett, the family physician of the soldier at the time of his death, testifies that he treated soldier during the years 1879, 1880, and 1881 for chronic bronchitis, neuralgia of left breast, and softening of the brain; that his mind has been somewhat affected since he knew him; that the softening of the brain increased during the year 1881, the last three months of which he was confined to the house or bed with wandering mind, loss of speech, and loss of use of limbs till death occurred, January 26, 1882; that during said years soldier's physical condition was such that his disability to labor might be averaged at one-quarter during the whole time.

That he received a wound of the left subscapular region of the chest during the war. Its location was not positively determined, as no autopsy was held after death.

That ever since his discharge he had a cough, with pain in left chest and side, and during the last three years there was pain and swelling of left testicle. That taking the history and symptoms into consideration, it is affiant's opinion that the wound helped to produce direct cause of death.

In an additional affidavit the doctor says that the direct cause of death was softening of the brain.

That the sympathetic nerves of left side were injured by the wound, and there were frequent neuralgic attacks which weakened the system and deranged digestion from constant irritation and helped to produce the condition of the brain from which he died.

Dr. Alpaugh, another physician who also attended the soldier during his last illness, says:

"I attended the soldier during his illness. He died January 26, 1882. The immediate cause of death was exhaustion from inanition, caused by softening of the brain. The minute or contributing cause was undoubtedly a wound in the upper part of the chest, which he received during his service in the Army."

The examinations made of the soldier's wound during his lifetime by surgeons, under order from the Pension Office, develop the fact that the ball inflicting wound entered in front of left shoulder, about the middle of the clavicle, and came out near the upper and inner part of the scapula, and that quite a number of bones were discharged from the openings. It would seem that the upper part of the left lung had been wounded, as at times the soldier was troubled with spitting of blood.

The soldier from the evidence in the case was a constant sufferer from his disabilities from discharge until death. The wound through his chest destroying part of the nervous system, reduced him so that he became greatly debilitated, and, though somewhat remote, may have produced softening of the brain.

The case is one which should be allowed, being possessed of merit, and your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. E. A. BENHAM.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 229) granting a pension to Mrs. E. A. Benham.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Mrs. E. A. Benham, widow of Bvt. Maj. Gen. Henry

W. Benham, deceased, and that she be paid a pension of $50 per month from and after the passage of this act.

The report (by Mr. HUTTON) is as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 229) granting a pension to Mrs. E. A. Benham, beg leave to report:

That Mrs. E. A. Benham is the widow of Bvt. Maj. Gen. Henry W. Benham. He was graduated from the Military Academy and promoted to the grade of brevet second lieutenant in the Corps of Engineers July 1, 1837, and died June 1, 1884, having served his country faithfully and well as engineer and soldier for a period of nearly thirty years.

As a testimonial to his patriotism, fidelity, and courage, and his personal and official worth, the order of Brigadier-General Newton is made a part of this report.

Both as an engineer and as a soldier, General Benham made a record of which any man might feel proud. During a period of thirty years of the most efficient and faithful service he was the recipient of the highest commendations from Generals Taylor, Wool, Scott, Totten, McClellan, Sherman, Hooker, Meade, and Grant, with a record rarely equaled, perhaps never surpassed, by one of his rank.

Your committee report the bill favorably, and recommend its passage.

GENERAL ORDERS, No. 9.

HEADQUARTERS CORPS OF ENGINEERS, UNITED STATES ARMY, Washington, D. C., June 5, 1884.

It becomes the painful duty of the brigadier-general commanding to announce to the Corps of Engineers the death of a brother officer.

Col. Henry W. Benham, Corps of Engineers (retired), brevet major-general, United States Army, died in New York city on the evening of June 1, 1884.

General Benham was graduated from the Military Academy and promoted to the grade of brevet second lieutenant in the Corps of Engineers July 1, 1837.

He was on duty as assistant in charge of the United States Coast Survey Office, Washington, D. C., and in Europe in connection therewith, from March, 1853, until November, 1856; as superintending engineer of the construction of Forts Winthrop and Independence, Boston Harbor, Massachusetts, 1856-'57; of the survey of site for fort on Clark's Point, New Bedford, Mass., and repair of Fort Adams, Newport Harbor, Rhode Island, 1857-'58; of the construction of the fort at Sandy Hook, 1858-'61; of the Potomac Aqueduct, 1860, and as engineer of the quarantine commissioners of New York Harbor, 1859-'60.

He served during the war of the rebellion, 1861-'66, as chief engineer Department of the Ohio, May-July, 1861, being engaged upon the staff of Brig. Gen. T. A. Morris, in military operations in Western Virginia, at Laurel Hill, July 6-11; in command of the troops engaged in the combat of Garrick's Ford, July 13, 1861, and as acting inspector-general, Department of the Ohio, August 5-16.

Promoted to the rank of brigadier-general of volunteers August 13, 1861, he took part in the campaign in West Virginia, August-November, 1861, being in command of a brigade at New Creek, August 16, 1861; in action at Carnifex Ferry, September 10, 1861, and the pursuit of the enemy from Cotton Hill to Raleigh County, Virginia, November 12-16, 1861. He was in command of the northern district of the Department of the South March to June, 1862, being present at Tybee Island, Georgia, during the bombardment and capture of Fort Pulaski April 10, 11, 1862, and engaged, in command, at the attack on Secessionville, James Island, South Carolina, June 16, 1862. From September, 1862, to February 28, 1863, he was on duty as superintending engineer of the construction of the fortification at Portsmouth Harbor, New Hampshire. Assigned to the command of the engineer brigade, Army of the Potomac, he was engaged in superintending the construction of ponton bridges across the Rappahannock for the passage of the Army of Chancellorsville, April 29-May 5, 1863; at Franklin's Crossing, in the face of the enemy, June 5, 1863, and over the Potomac, at Edwards Ferry, June 21, 1863. From July, 1863, to May, 1864, he was in charge of the ponton depot at Washington, D. C.

From June, 1864, to June, 1865, he was in command of the engineer brigade, Army of the Potomac, being engaged in superintending the construction of a ponton bridge, 2,200 feet long, across the James River, at Fort Powhatan, June 15, 1864; in the construction and command of the defenses of City Point, Va., October, 1864, to April 2, 1865; in holding the captured lines at Petersburg, April 2, 1865; in repairing bridges across the Appomattox and Staunton Rivers, April 3-23, 1865, and on march to Washington, D. C., May-June, 1865. Since the close of the war General Benham served as superintending engineer of the construction of Fort Winthrop and Fort Independence, Massachusetts, from 1865 to 1882; of Fort Warren, Massachusetts, from 1867 to 1882; of works on Long Island Head from 1869 to 1882; of the defenses of Provincetown, Mass., from 1866 to 1870, and from 1872 to 1877; of the construction of Boston Harbor sea-walls from May, 1866, to April, 1873, and of Fort Montgomery, New York, and the inner defenses of New York Harbor, the forts at New York Narrows, and of Sandy Hook, New York, from July, 1877, until June 30, 1882, when he was retired from active service by the operation of law.

General Benham was promoted successively from the grade of lieutenant to that of colonel of engineers and brigadier-general of volunteers, having declined the appointment of major in the Ninth Infantry, tendered him in March, 1855.

He received the brevets of captain, United States Army, "for gallant and meritorious conduct in the battle of Buena Vista," February 23, 1847; colonel, United States Army, "for gallant and meritorious services in the battle of Garrick's Ford, Va.," July 13, 1861; brigadier-general, United States Army, for "gallant and meritorious services in the campaign terminating with the surrender of the insurgent army under General Robert E. Lee," March 13, 1865; major-general, United States Army, for "gallant and meritorious services during the war," March 13, 1865, and major-general of volunteers, "for gallant and meritorious services during the war," March 13, 1865.

The record of General Benham's services and his zeal in the discharge of his duties form the best tribute to his memory.

As a testimonial of respect for the memory of the deceased, the officers of the Corps of Engineers will wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty days.

By command of Brigadier-General Newton:

JOHN M. WILSON,
Major of Engineers, Bvt. Colonel U. S. A.

Mr. PRICE. I would like to have the bill amended so as to provide that this lady be placed on the pension-roll subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

Mr. WOLFORD. I understand that a Senate bill similar to this has been passed by that body, and I desire that it be substituted for the House bill.

Mr. HUTTON. Mr. Chairman, as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WOLFORD] has just stated, the Senate has passed a bill substantially the same as this bill of the House. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate bill may be taken up and recommended to the House for passage, and that this bill be reported with a recommendation that it lie on the table.

The CHAIRMAN. The Senate bill will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. E. A. Benham, wife of the late General Henry W. Benham, at the rate of $50 per month.

Mr. PRICE. I have no objection to substituting the Senate bill for the House bill; but, if the Senate bill is under consideration, I move to amend by striking out the concluding clause (which fixes the pension at the rate of $50 per month) and substituting a clause that this lady be pensioned subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

Mr. BRADY. I trust that the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PRICE] will not prevail. It is customary to grant to the widows of major-generals in the Army pensions of $50 per month. There are a number of precedents——

A MEMBER. Thirty-nine.

Mr. BRADY. Thirty-nine! There are some forty-four.

Mr. CONGER. Was this soldier a general officer?

Mr. BRADY. He left the service with the rank of major-general.

Mr. CONGER. By brevet?

Mr. BRADY. By brevet.

Mr. CONGER. But he was only a lieutenant, as I understand.

Mr. BRADY. No, sir; he was a colonel in the regular Army and a general in the volunteer service.

Mr. CONGER. What was his rank as a volunteer?

Mr. BRADY. A brigadier-general. And he was a colonel in the regular Army. The report of the committee, as presented by the honorable gentleman in charge of this bill, presents all the facts in the case as strongly as it can possibly be done, and therefore I do not propose to detain the House by going over them.

Mr. CONGER. Do I understand the gentleman to say that this man was only general by brevet?

Mr. BRADY. He was a colonel in the regular Army, but he was a brevet brigadier-general in the volunteer service. He rendered gallant and distinguished service in the Army of the Potomac as a brevet brigadier-general in the volunteer service. He gained as much distinction and rendered service equally as valuable as that of others in whose cases pensions were granted precisely as it is proposed to grant a pension in this case. I see no good reason why this case should be made an exception to what seems to have been the general course of precedents in this regard. Nor do I see any good reason why the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PRICE] should be adopted, nor why his reasons should prevail, except the one he offers in every case of this sort. And I trust I do not misrepresent the position of the honorable gentleman, that he strenuously objects to the granting of a pension of $50 in any one of these cases—not especially in this case, but in any case—because he objects to the granting of any higher pension in any of these cases than that which is authorized by law, and which in this particular case would be $30 a month instead of $50, which the bill proposes to grant.

Now to recapitulate without going into all the facts of the case, which have been so fully presented, as I have already stated, by the report of the committee, this is a case equal to any of those heretofore passed by Congress, embracing forty-odd precedents of similar character. I have in my possession a list of thirty-odd cases furnished to me by the Commissioner of Pensions a few weeks ago. Since then Congress has added to the list until we have from forty to fifty cases similar to this, not one of which in my judgment is stronger or more entitled to consideration than the one now pending.

Mr. PRICE. The gentleman does not properly state my position, although he has unconsciously erred, but it is this: I do not care whether the pension be $30, $50, or $500; that is no object to me; I claim our revenues are not sufficient, and that we will never live long enough to pay properly the men who fought our battles and won our victories; the point I make is this, and I hope the gentleman will not have any reason to misstate it in the future, that there is no good reason why this House or this Congress should make any distinction between officers and privates in the granting of pensions for services during the war. It is not right, it is not just, it is not honest, and for one I do not wish to do a dishonest thing unless I get something for doing it. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRADY. It may not be honest according to the opinion of the gentleman from Wisconsin, but such is not the opinion of Congress, for it has granted precisely similar pensions in some forty or fifty cases which have already become precedents.

Mr. PRICE. Do you wish to make another speech, or will you allow me to make my own? [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BRADY. I yield the floor, and the gentleman from Wisconsin will proceed.

Mr. PRICE. Here we have precisely the same vicious argument over again and again on the part of this committee, and in every one of these vicious cases, so that whenever a man can find no other reason, no equity, no justice, no common sense in a proposition, he falls back upon the same assertion, that it ought to be done because they have done precisely the same mean thing away back yonder. [Laughter.] I do not care anything about these precedents. No precedent can make what is wrong right. What I object to is providing in these special cases—that is, in the case of these officers—the pension shall be fixed at $50 a month, while in the case of John Smith, back of the hills, the pension is put down "subject to the rules and limitations of the pension laws." I oppose this unjust distinction. I believe the law should fix the amount of the pension, and that in all cases where pensions are granted they should provide a pension in accordance with the provision of the law upon the statute-book.

Now, sir, I am willing that this bill shall be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass, but upon the distinct understanding that the vote shall be taken in the House when a quorum is present. I am not willing that this or any other bill changing existing law should pass unless by a vote in a full House.

Mr. BRADY. Let me inquire of the gentleman from Wisconsin why an officer of the Army in time of war or in time of peace receives greater pay than a private soldier?

Mr. PRICE. Because it is the custom and in accordance with business principles that we should pay for one kind of talent more than for another.

Mr. BRADY. And that is just this case.

Mr. PRICE. It is to be presumed this officer while serving in the Army went on horseback, while at the same time John Smith trooped after him on foot, the man on horseback of course receiving larger compensation than the man who served on foot. He had greater ability and of course received larger pay.

Mr. LOVERING. It is the first time I ever heard of a man in the Navy riding a-horseback. [Laughter.]

Mr. PRICE. I was not aware nor am I yet that this is the case of a naval officer. Even if it were, I doubt whether three-fourths of those who are in the Navy could tell whether some of the men serving as officers were on foot or horseback. [Laughter and applause.]

I lay it down as a principle, Mr. Chairman, that the general law should provide exactly the pension which should be received in all these cases; and when a bill is passed here it should be provided that the pension should be in accordance with the rules and regulations of the general law.

Mr. BRADY. Why does not the gentleman introduce a general bill?

Mr. PRICE. I have introduced half a dozen common-sense bills and had them referred to this same committee, but so far I have not the least reason to believe any one of them will ever be reported back into this House. I have introduced a bill here, referred it to that committee, that every man who served in the Union Army during the war should be pensioned—every one of them. But I do not see any indication or disposition on the part of that committee to consider and act upon anything of the kind. But I will not occupy any more time. That is the position I occupy and would like to maintain it.

Mr. SEYMOUR. Mr. Chairman, I trust the gentleman from Wisconsin will not insist upon the position which he takes in reference to this case. I am certain he would not do so if he had read the whole report, and I am quite certain he has not read it in full, at least I so infer from the evidence furnished by his own remarks. Had he read it he would have seen that this is the very last case that should be used for the purpose of breaking the long line of precedents established by Congress in the granting of pensions such as this. I repeat, sir, the whole report was not read. I do not believe, if it had been read, that there is a man on this floor who would not assent that this is the last case that should be used for the purpose of making such an objection.

I take it upon myself to say—for I had the honor to introduce this bill—that there is not a more meritorious case among the whole fifty or more cases that have heretofore passed Congress granting such relief. There is not one in the entire list that has a higher claim than this one. Why, sir, this man, now for more than thirty years, commencing in the Mexican war with meritorious and useful services for the Government, fairly gave his whole life, every hour of it, when his services were called for to the service of his country, taking part as he did in all the great and memorable military operations during that period. He leaves a widow who has a claim upon us greater than that of any of those who have heretofore been pensioned at this amount.

I have said if the whole of this report had been read it would show that no stronger case could be presented than this. The report speaks of the long line of meritorious services in which this officer was engaged. It speaks of building bridges in times of exigency; but it does not tell you, Mr. Chairman, of the building of one of these bridges—I forget which—by this brave man, when instead of standing on the brink and directing how it should be done, being informed that it must be built with the greatest expedition for the safety of the Army, plunged into the cold water, and by the side of the workmen themselves lent his own assistance to the speedy work of its construction, not only conducting the work and directing its operation, but actually helping by manual labor to build the bridge.

I believe if it was not for that service which he rendered to his country his widow would not be a widow to-day, applying here for that help which she is now compelled to ask this Government for, because she would still have been relying upon his own strong arm. I do not believe that any man can read this report without acknowledging the truth of this statement.

Why it was only a week ago, my friend from Wisconsin then present, when precisely a similar case was before the House and he permitted that bill to pass and did not object or take the same position that he takes with reference to this; nor did he then require that that should go to the House to be voted upon when a quorum was present.

That was a proposition to pay a $50 pension—not as meritorious a case as this; and I beg him now not to take the most meritorious case of all and make this break in the line of precedents. I make this appeal because I am satisfied there is no man present who would not come to the conclusion to which this committee came upon an examination of the report. I ask the gentleman therefore for the sake of consistency—permitting as he did a similar bill to pass a week ago—not to plant himself right in the path of this meritorious bill, but wait until a bill comes in against which his strictures may be properly applied.

Mr. PRICE. What bill do you refer to?

Mr. SEYMOUR. I refer to the bill against which you alone voted on the last Friday's session—the bill granting a pension to Margaret B. Harwood.

I do not know whether my friend from Wisconsin has been in the habit of attending these evening sessions or not. During the last session of the House I was here night after night, and I may be permitted to say that I have seen many of these bills pass, and in my opinion none of them were more meritorious than this.

Mr. PERKINS. Does not the report in this case show as a matter of fact that this man reached the rank of brigadier-general of the volunteer service and the brevet rank of major-general?

Mr. SEYMOUR. Yes, sir; the report shows it.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, I do not think it is right to make an exception in this case. I regret to differ with my friend from Connecticut [Mr. SEYMOUR], whose judgment I so much esteem, but it has been the invariable rule of the House in matters of this kind to give to the widow of a colonel—and we have passed numbers of such bills—a colonel who fell upon the field of battle, who gave his life for his country, and that is more than this gentleman gave—I say it has been the custom to give to the widow of such colonel only $30 a month. Now, I do not think it is right, I do not think it is justice to these widows to make an exception of this kind, and give to this one a larger pension than we have given under the general law. It is only in some exceptional cases where a pension has been given, and I have never approved of a single case where such pension has been granted at a rate higher than $30 a month to the widow of a major-general. This man was not a major-general, but by brevet only; and the custom has been to give to the widow of an officer above the rank of lieutenant-colonel $30 a month.

Mr. MATSON. That is the law.

Mr. PETERS. And I can not see why it is that an exception should be made here when we have a number of cases where colonels and lieutenant-colonels have fallen upon the field of battle and we give their widows but $30 a month.

The long line of service rendered by this man to his country, while it is creditable to him, yet does not demand from this Government any more recognition than the services of the man who laid down his life for the country. This man, as I understand, was educated at West Point at the expense of the Government, and the Government gave him his position in the regular Army. And all that might be urged as a reason why this man is not entitled to any more consideration than the man who volunteered in the service of his country and fell on the field of battle, reaching only the rank of colonel. To the colonel's widow we give only $30, and to give what is here proposed to the widow of this brevet-general is doing an injustice and an injury to the widow of every colonel who fell on the field of battle.

Mr. PRICE. I have been charged with inconsistency by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. SEYMOUR]. I will say I have sat here to-day with House bill No. 81 on my desk with an amendment prepared to strike out all after the word "Navy," in the seventh line, which takes off the sum of $50. I distinctly objected to that a week ago. That bill and three others were objected to by me, and by agreement were passed over, as I understood. The RECORD does not show that, but it shows that I objected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Wisconsin and the gentleman from Connecticut that the bill referred to is on the Calendar as unfinished business and is still pending.

Mr. PRICE. Then my objection was taken, and I am not inconsistent, though I may be wrong. But I desire to test the sense of the committee upon the proposition to amend by striking out the last clause of the bill, which indicates the amount to be paid.

Mr. WOLFORD. I desire to say a few words in order to see if I can not get my distinguished friend from Wisconsin [Mr. PRICE] to think right about this question.

Mr. PRICE. You will not change the view I take.

Mr. WOLFORD. I think I can. The gentleman from Wisconsin and the other gentleman over the way are evidently laboring under a mistake. This man, it is true, was a colonel in the regular Army; and I supposed everybody knew that a colonel of the regular Army was a general in the volunteer Army.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Since when, and by what law?

Mr. WOLFORD. By the law of the United States made during the war of the rebellion in its darkest days and acted on through the whole of the war. It has never been controverted until I heard it controverted to-night that a colonel in the regular Army has the rank of brigadier-general in the volunteer army. I want the attention of my friend from Wisconsin and of my friend over the way to this point. How did this officer come to be a brigadier-general? He was commissioned brigadier-general—he was not a brevet-brigadier, but he was commissioned brigadier-general for gallant and meritorious service upon the battlefield, because he had so marshaled his men; because he had so shown that great individual bravery and that great collective genius for marshaling men as to save the lives of an army; because he had under his control the lives and characters and happiness of thousands of men.

It was because he showed his extraordinary ability, because he showed that he was distinguished for his quickness of thought, that he was distinguished for that aptitude for command which is the characteristic of our great men and displays the great man when the occasion offers. A thousand occasions might have offered to a man of inferior intellect and he never could have made himself distinguished like this gallant general.

For that distinguished service the country said and the President of the United States said he shall be a general, and he was commissioned as a general. Then again he went on showing his great mind, his great soul, his great heart, and led his hosts on to victory. He went on till he was brevetted a major-general. A higher mark can not be made than was made by this officer. It is true he did not have the commission of a major-general. But he received his brevet for gallant and brave and meritorious services, for the depth of mind and heart and soul that grasped the condition of the country and the condition of the Army, that took him into the front and the lead of the great fight to redeem this country and save the Union. And he did more than most men did for the salvation of the Union.

I know my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. PRICE], when he comes to think of it, will not say for a moment that such services as these are to be put upon the common plane; that the humblest private can do the same thing. The private soldier might have the mind and the heart and the soul of the general, but he had nothing to do but to take care of himself and obey orders. He had no responsibility. Whose life, whose honor were in the hands of the private save his own? But the general that commands has the life and honor and happiness of the whole army under his control. For that reason General Grant was a greater man than my friend from Wisconsin [laughter], however much he may talk about the common level of humanity. For that reason General Hancock was a greater man than the men who did not do the service he did; and the country has recognized that fact.

The world has recognized all along the line of human history that the man who does the most for his country is loved most by the country. That is the order of God Almighty.

He that does much will receive much in the great Day of Judgment. That applies to him that does most for his country, and who, sir—I take up the word of my distinguished friend who has preceded me—who ever did more for his country than this report shows was done by this officer? I do see some force in the position of men who sit back here and say, "Although there is no law, we will make a law unto ourselves, and say that none but the widows of general officers shall receive a pension of $50 a month;" but that is no reason for opposing this bill. Here is the widow of a general officer, an absolute brigadier-general and a brevet major-general, who did the duties of a major-general.

Mr. PETERS. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. WOLFORD. Yes, sir.

Mr. PETERS. Where did this colonel serve?

Mr. WOLFORD. Did you hear the report read? [Laughter.] Now, I do not want that report read again. Mr. Chairman, neither of these distinguished gentlemen who are opposing this bill listened to the report, and there, in a nutshell, is the secret of their opposition; neither of them has listened to the report, but they just come in here resolved that they will set up a rebellion in the camp of humanity. [Renewed laughter.] They come here prepared to say that what all the world regards as true is false, and that what all the world calls good is bad. I wish the gentlemen had time to read that report, for then there would be no need of my arguing this case. [Laughter.] I hope the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PETERS] will read the report, and I hope he will postpone voting against this righteous bill until he has read it, because no man ever did more for his country than this officer.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I turn to my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. PRICE] and I want to talk to him kindly. [Laughter.] I know that he is not going to the extreme of saying that he will call a quorum on us if we do not let him dictate to the whole Congress. Now, sir [addressing Mr. PRICE], I want to talk candidly and kindly to you for a minute. [Laughter.] You are in a minority in this Congress. If there is another man in this Congress or anywhere else that believes as you do about pensions all I have to say is, God help that man. [Renewed laughter.] Being in a minority, then, are you going to set yourself up here and say that the wisdom of ages that has come all along down the stream of time, the wisdom which declares there is a difference between the officer and the private—are you going to set yourself against that and say, "If I can not control by my reasoning (and the gentleman is a powerful reasoner), if I can not control by my eloquence (and does not he rise to a great degree of eloquence when he has a mind to?), if I can not control by my reason or by my eloquence I will compel you to bow to my will by calling a quorum on you?" [Great laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, by attending these Friday evening sessions I certainly have learned a great deal about the great men of this country. I did not know before that we had so many great men. [Laughter.] Every time any gentleman wants us to grant a big pension to a widow, we are told that her husband was the greatest man in the world, and my friend from Kentucky [Mr. WOLFORD] makes the same speech that he has made to-night in every case where he wants a pension increased. In every case the lady's husband was the biggest man living.

Mr. WOLFORD. That is the sort I am for. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Then my friend from Missouri [Mr. WARNER], who is not present at this moment, comes in and asks us to pension a widow out there at $24 a month because her husband was the gamest man on top of the earth. [Laughter.] And so it goes; every time they want an increase of pension for a widow they put it on the ground that her husband was a very great man. Now, the pension is not to the man; it is to the widow.

Mr. BINGHAM. She is his natural heir.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Then if she is his heir let her take what property he has left, and do not run your hand into the pocket of sombody else for her benefit.

Mr. BINGHAM. He has left her an inheritance of courage and devotion to duty.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Then she ought to be rich upon it. Courage is not dollars and cents.

Mr. BINGHAM. In such cases it ought to be requited with dollars and cents.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Then, Mr. Chairman, if that be true, you must pick out one private here and another private there, and pension the widow of one at one rate and the widow of the other at another rate, because one was a man of more brains or a braver man than the other, though each did his duty. I understand the position of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PRICE] to be this: That the widows of every class shall be treated alike; the widows of privates alike, the widows of colonels alike, and the widows of generals alike, and that we shall not pick out a case here and there and make it special. That I understand is the gentleman's position, and he is right. That is the true theory, because, as the Chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions has well said, the pension goes to the widow for her support, not for the gallantry of her husband. You can single out isolated cases all over the land where the same kind of arguments would be good in favor of pensioning one widow at a higher rate than another.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to occupy the time of the House in needless discussion, because there are other cases on the Calendar that demand consideration. I desire to say, however, in answer to the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSTON] that my colleague [Mr. WARNER, of Missouri] is not here to-night——

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I understand that.

Mr. DOCKERY. But I plead guilty for him to the fact that he did say Nat. M. Gwynne was one of the most gallant men in the Army. I will add that my colleague was justified in saying that, because the Congress of the United States had singled this man out for special recognition on account of his gallantry.

Mr. PRICE. The gentleman does not refer to the case now under consideration?

Mr. DOCKERY. No, sir; but to the case to which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSTON] has alluded.

Now, I want to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill (because I am somewhat in doubt as to the proper action to be taken upon it) whether the report shows that this gentleman was a brigadier-general?

Mr. HUTTON. It does.

Mr. DOCKERY. I wish to ask also whether the law makes a difference in the pensions paid to the widows of brigadier-generals and colonels?

Several MEMBERS. It does not.

A MEMBER. The general law makes no distinction.

Mr. HUTTON. I do not know that the law makes any distinction as to pensions between the widows of colonels and those of brigadier-generals. But this House has made a difference. I believe the general policy of the House has been to give to widows of brigadier-generals a pension of $50 a month.

I wish to repeat what my friend from Connecticut [Mr. SEYMOUR] has just said, that no more meritorious case than this has been presented to this House. General Benham has a record that has not been equaled, so far as I know, by that of any other man for the number of years in which he was in the service or the faithfulness of that service—service both as a skillful engineer and as a brave soldier. Entering the service in 1837, his record is not surpassed by that of any other man of whom I have any knowledge. He died a poor man. His widow, who is to-day old and feeble and poor, comes here, and, in view of her husband's long service, asks this House to give her a pension upon which she can live comfortably the remainder of her days. What is proposed in this case is only what has been done in the cases of other widows under like circumstances. I do not believe that it is necessary to argue this question a single moment. I believe that the record presented to this Committee of the Whole is sufficient to secure favorable action on this bill. I hope the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Is this widow drawing a pension now?

Mr. HUTTON. Yes, sir. This bill is to increase the pension from $25 to $50.

Mr. BRADY. I think my frend [Mr. HUTTON] is mistaken on that point. Mrs. Benham, as I understand from her daughter, is not now drawing a pension.

Mr. HUTTON. Then I am mistaken.

Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR. She is drawing a pension of $20 a month as the daughter of General McNeill.

Mr. BINGHAM. But she is not drawing pension as the widow of General Benham.

Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR. No, sir.

Mr. BRADY. I know from her daughter that she is not drawing a pension.

Mr. BINGHAM. Is not drawing a pension as the widow of General Benham.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Will she draw two pensions if we pass this bill?

Mr. BRADY. She can not draw two pensions.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. PRICE, there were—yeas 5, nays 31.

Mr. PRICE. I suggest to gentlemen here that they let this bill go to the House with a favorable recommendation and that it be voted upon by the House when there is a quorum present. I do not wish to see this bill passed unless it be by a quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks that this Senate bill may be laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it pass, but with the understanding that it shall not be taken up in the House to-night.

Mr. BRADY. Would it not be proper that such an arrangement should be made in the House instead of in committee?

Mr. PRICE. We can make the understanding now.

Mr. BRADY. Is it in order for the gentleman to make that motion?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the bill may be laid aside with the understanding that it be reported favorably to the House, but that it be not taken up in the House to be voted upon to-night, but come up in the regular order of Friday's business.

Mr. LOVERING. What will be the status of the bill when it comes before the House? There were some bills which went over last Friday night as unfinished business; and my supposition was that they would come up to-day at the regular session of the House as unfinished business.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that if when this bill is reached in regular order to-night the previous question be ordered upon it, and it then goes over, it will, as the Chair understands, come up as unfinished business next Friday.

Mr. PERKINS. It can be laid aside with the understanding that in the House we order the previous question.

Mr. DOCKERY. If the previous question be ordered, the bill will come up on Monday morning.

Mr. WOLFORD. That is the ruling of the Speaker.

Mr. DOCKERY. Yes; I think the Speaker ruled that in such a case the bill would come up on the succeeding Monday morning.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. WOLFORD. Before determining whether I will object I want to make a parliamentary inquiry. If the bill goes to the House, is there to be, after the previous question, such debate allowed as the parties may agree on? I do not want the bill to be voted on in the House without the House having an opportunity to understand what it is.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the rule fixes the limit of debate in such cases—fifteen minutes on each side.

Mr. WOLFORD. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will again state the proposition of the gentleman from Wisconsin. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the Senate bill be laid aside with the recommendation that it pass, and with the understanding that after the previous question shall be ordered upon it in the House it shall go over as unfinished business. Is there objection?

Mr. MATSON. I would suggest a further agreement, that instead of coming up after the reading of the Journal on Monday next, it shall be disposed of on Friday after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. BRADY. The understanding is that it is to come up as unfinished business.

Mr. BINGHAM. Let me state, Mr. Chairman, that two weeks ago, when the case of Mrs. Ellen Mitchell came before this House in its limited membership, it went over by unanimous consent, and the presumption was it would go over to the Friday succeeding, but the Speaker, on examination of the rules, determined it could not be considered on Friday. Therefore I came to the session of Friday a week ago and made the motion that the bill come up by unanimous consent immediately after the reading of the Journal on Monday morning. I presume it is the purpose of the gentlemen in the interest of the Benham bill it should come before a full House. Therefore I suggest, under the ruling of the Speaker one week ago when this motion was entertained on the Mrs. Mitchell bill, that it be agreed it shall come up immediately after the reading of the Journal on Monday next. I stated that evening, "I ask unanimous consent, and trust the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions will concede it, that the previous question may be considered as ordered on the engrossment and third reading of the bill and also on its passage, and that it may go over for the present, which will throw it over until Monday next as unfinished business." The Speaker ruled on Monday morning that motion carried it into the House immediately after the reading of the Journal, allowing fifteen minutes of debate on each side on the assumption that no debate had previously been accorded to it.

Mr. MATSON. It was that precedent to which I had reference.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that was the statement of the Chair heretofore made, that if the previous question was ordered on the engrossment and third reading of the bill it would go over as unfinished business.

Mr. MATSON. It would go over to the next day the House was in session when unfinished business was in order. Now, what I wish to say is this: That there has been complaint about pension bills considered here in night sessions going over as unfinished business and interfering with the general business of the House. The sentiment seems to be that that class of business should be taken up on Friday instead of on Monday, and therefore I wish to incorporate this further understanding, that this matter, as well as some others which have been passed over, should come up on Friday next, immediately after the reading of the Journal, instead of on Monday next, to be disposed of in a full House at that time.

Mr. WOLFORD. Would not the gentleman be willing to insert in the unanimous consent that when the bill itself came up on Friday next fifteen minutes of debate shall be allowed on each side?

Mr. MATSON. That is provided for in the rules.

Mr. WOLFORD. I think not, and therefore I would like to have that inserted as a part of the understanding. For one, I should like to have some explanation in reference to the provisions of this bill before called upon to vote upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will now state the request with the modification suggested by the gentleman from Indiana. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PRICE] asks by unanimous consent this bill be laid aside with the understanding when reached in the House the previous question shall be considered as ordered, and that it shall be voted on after the reading of the Journal on Friday next in its regular order.

Mr. BINGHAM. The House will not recognize it on Friday next.

A MEMBER. But the Speaker will.

Mr. BRADY. Friday has been set apart for the consideration of private bills.

Mr. MATSON. I ask it shall be inserted as a part of the understanding that the bill shall be taken up next Friday immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. BRADY. Does that set aside the consideration of private bills on Friday?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and the Senate bill will be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass, and that the bill H. R. 229 be laid on the table.

SURGEON ALFRED M. OWEN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4689) for the relief of the children of the late Surgeon Alfred M. Owen, and to increase their pensions.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That Alfred C. Owen, Christine Q. Owen, Kathleen D. B. Owen, and Alfred T. Owen, minor children of the late Surgeon Alfred M. Owen, United States Navy, be, and they are hereby, granted and allowed a pension of $25 each per month, to date from the 23d day of August, 1883, on which day the said Surgeon Alfred M. Owen died, and to continue until each child shall respectively attain the age of twenty-one years; and the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the names of the said Alfred C. Owen, Christine Q. Owen, Kathleen D. B. Owen, and Albert T. Owen on the pension-roll at said rates, in lieu of the pensions now paid them. In paying the pensions from the day of Surgeon Alfred M. Owen's death to the date of the passage of this act, the Secretary of the Interior is directed to deduct from the amounts herein allowed the sums already received by the said Alfred C. Owen, Christine Q. Owen, Kathleen D. B. Owen, and Albert T. Owen, or their lawful guardian.

The report (by Mr. SCOTT) was read, as follows:

The naval career of the deceased officer, which began in May, 1869, was one of exceptional credit, and was made conspicuous by an unusually wide range of duties by sea and land. From his entry into the service until his death he was constantly employed, exercising professional attainments of a very high order, and that he dignified every duty assigned him by the zeal, courage, fidelity, and intelligence displayed in its execution is the testimony of all who knew him.

He was always conscientious, earnest, skillful, kind, and courteous, commanding thereby the affection and confidence of the sick, and the respect and admiration of his superiors.

In February, 1882, he reported for duty at the navy-yard, Pensacola, and a few months later was combating the much-dreaded yellow fever. By his judicious sanitary provisions and personal force and courage he established a cordon of environment which preserved the naval station from the plague which devastated the neighboring city. At the height of the epidemic, when the physicians of Pensacola had been cut off by the fell disease, he bravely volunteered to go into the city to attend the afflicted.

In the following summer (1883) he was without medical assistance, performing the quadruple duty of surgeon of the navy-yard, surgeon of the naval hospital, surgeon of the reservation, and quarantine officer of the lower bay.

A return of the fever was looked for. Every officer who could be spared was permitted to leave, and this brave officer could have been detached upon application, but he scorned the thought.

August 14, 1883, the fever reappeared. Overexertion and exposure to the sun had caused Surgeon Owen a partial sunstroke in July, and while yet suffering from this, he was, on August 16, himself seized with the fever. For two days there was no one on land to treat the hero, and on the 22d he died. His faithful wife was untiring in her efforts at his bedside, and within a day or so after his death she was stricken with the same disease; at midnight of the 29th she was buried by his side.

They left behind them four children, between the ages of three months and eight years, each of whom and their nurse also had the fever.

The committee therefore recommend that the amounts named in the bill be allowed to the four children of the deceased.

Mr. MATSON. I understand the proposition is to pension these children at $25 a month, and there being four of them the proposition would amount to giving $100 per month to the children of this surgeon. This bill is a very extraordinary one, and I think in order to shorten matters it should take the course of the one just disposed of. I ask by unanimous consent, therefore, it shall be allowed to go over with the same understanding.

Mr. BRADY. Before that, to which I shall object, I desire to submit another proposition, that in the absence of Mr. SCOTT, who has reported this bill, I ask unanimous consent that it be passed over informally, retaining its place on the Calendar.

Mr. MATSON. I suppose that Mr. SCOTT will be present when it comes up if it goes over until Friday, and he can be heard in the House as well as at any other time in the committee if the bill is passed over.

Mr. BRADY. Yes; but it has been a courtesy usually extended.

Mr. MATSON. I have no objection whatever to that course if the gentleman prefers it.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the bill will be passed over informally, retaining its place on the Calendar.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

MARY HOWARD FARQUHAR.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1201) for the relief of Mary Howard Farquhar.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That from and after the passage of this act the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Mary Howard Farquhar, widow of the late Major and Bvt. Lieut. Col. Francis V. Farquhar, Corps of Engineers, United States Army, and daughter of Maj. Gen. Alpheus S. Williams, United States Volunteers, at the rate of $50 per month, in lieu of the pension which she now receives.

Mr. CONGER. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. SCOTT) is as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1201) granting a pension to Mary H. Farquhar, after duly considering the same, report it back, and recommend its passage with the following amendment: Strike out the word "fifty" and insert the word "forty."

In consideration of the long and faithful services of Major and Bvt. Lieut. Col. Francis M. Farquhar, and the necessities of his widow, Mary H. Farquhar, your committee believe that a pension of $40 per month is not excessive under the circumstances, and respectfully recommend that it be granted.

Mr. PETERS. That bill, I think, Mr. Chairman, had better take the course of the others.

Mr. MAYBURY. Mr. Chairman, I sincerely hope that this bill will be reported favorably to the House. The report hardly does the case justice, and I say this without intending to reflect in the least upon the gentleman who made it; but the facts are simply these: Colonel Farquhar died in the city of Detroit some four years ago, and it was a matter of common notoriety that his death was hastened, if not caused directly, from the effect of hardship suffered in the service. He died in the prime of his life, leaving a widow and two infant children. The report does not, as I have said, state the facts upon which the increase of pension is asked, namely, the early demise of Colonel Farquhar, which is chargeable directly to the hardships suffered in the service not only on the frontier and in the war of the rebellion, but afterward in the construction of a public work along the northern frontier, a work that stands to-day as a monument to his skill and faithfulness. An added inducement in the mind of the committee to make this report was the fact that Mrs. Farquhar was the daughter of the late General Alpheus S. Williams, a soldier of three wars, who commanded the Ninth Army Corps of the Army of the Potomac, and as gallant and faithful a soldier as ever drew a sword.

I hope, therefore, that this House will not refuse this very small amount to Mrs. Farquhar to aid her in bringing up her little children.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Chairman, if this was the only case of this kind perhaps the House could act without doing injustice, but the difficulty is that all of these widows, at least a great many of them, think they ought to have their pensions increased; and it is a pretty tolerably safe proposition now to say that if you are going to enter upon this thing you will have to increase all of them. That is the sum and substance of it.

Mrs. Farquhar is doubtless a most estimable lady; her husband, as well as her father, won distinction; both were gallant and efficient officers; but she gets exactly the same pension that the widows of other officers get whose husbands held similar positions.

Mr. LAIRD. What command had he?

Mr. MATSON. He was an engineer officer.

Mr. LAIRD. Of what rank?

Mr. MATSON. The rank of major.

This lady is now getting a pension of $25 a month, and each of her children gets an allowance of $2 a month.

Now, I have said so often to this House that I do not like to repeat it, but it seems to me to be necessary, that while the bills which were passed here to increase the pensions of the widows of general officers have been allowed, not generally without much opposition, still I think that not only the members of the House but the country itself is beginning to get a little tired of even that. They are coming to the conclusion that this thing is going a little too far. We had just as well face the fact now, for I tell you the people of this country are getting tired of high pensions; and why? Because of the fact that there are thousands of the widows of soldiers to-day who are getting no pension at all.

Mr. PRICE. That is it.

Mr. MATSON. That is the reason. It is not because they are disposed to be illiberal, but because one woman gets a pension of $50 a month, while many others get less than that and a great number of them get nothing at all. The people do not approve of these things; and the trouble about the matter is that so far as the House is concerned we will be bothered by all of them coming in and asking increases unless we put a stop to this system of legislating. There is no reason why there should be any exception. I do not see a single reason stated, nor have I heard one in the ingenious and able argument of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAYBURY]. The fact that the husband of this lady died young is cited; but the country got that much less service from him. The general proposition laid down in these cases has been heretofore that the man served a lifetime, or something of that kind; that he wore himself out. But here the proposition is reversed, and we are told that he died in a very short time—died early in his service, that he did so little or had so little opportunity to provide for his widow.

It only shows, Mr. Chairman, to what sort of resorts those who here advocate these unequal pensions are driven in order to maintain them. I shall insist that this bill ought to take the same course that others have taken. I insist on it for this reason, not only on the ground of the impolicy of granting unequal pensions, but in the interest of the business of this House and its Friday night sessions, because the House will not tolerate a departure from its well-established rules by the mere handful of men who may assemble here, if we go and widen this matter of granting pensions until a large number of persons shall come here pressing their claims and annoying Congress with claims which ought not to be provided for by special act.

Mr. DOCKERY. It is not my habit to interpose an objection to any proposition that meets the favor of a majority of any body assembled to consider a given measure. But I must object to carrying over these measures to the day sessions of Friday. The House has by special order set apart Friday evening to consider bills reported from the Committee on Pensions and from the Committee on Invalid Pensions. The day session of Friday is set apart for the consideration of private bills of a different character and which are generally meritorious.

Now, if we are to establish the rule that because one member objects we shall then by unanimous consent carry over these measures to the day session of Friday the result will be to deny justice to hundreds of claimants who are now asking relief at the hands of Congress and who are entitled to it. For my part I am willing to submit to the voice of those assembled here to transact this business, and if we can not do business in that way I hope some other method will be devised, because I shall certainly object to carrying over these measures to each succeeding Friday and occupying the Friday afternoon session with business which has been committed by a special order of the House to the sessions of Friday evening.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. I hope the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] will not insist on his objection. It seems to me it comes too late after the action of the committee on the Benham case. If there was to be any objection to this course of proceeding—and it is a course of proceeding which has been sanctioned by the House heretofore—it should have been taken at its inception, and not now.

The committee should not be called upon to make fish of one and flesh of another. This order has been made in the Benham case and in other similar cases in my recollection since I have been a member of this House; and I do not think it is becoming for any member of the committee who has been present while such orders have been made to object now. I hope, therefore, while the gentleman from Missouri knows his own duty better than I can tell him—I hope on account of the high regard we all entertain for his character for consistency and desire to do what is right he will withdraw all objection to this bill taking the course which was indicated in the Benham case.

Mr. DOCKERY. I believe I have a consistent record in regard to standing by the voice of the majority, and I do not think any one can charge me with attempting to exercise a one-man power. I am willing to abide by the voice of the majority, whether it be six, or twelve, or twenty-four. But I have protested, and I now renew the protest, against the habit of sending over these bills to our Friday afternoon sessions. I do not desire to interpose any objection to any pension. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ERMENTROUT] has not been so often present perhaps as I have been at these Friday evening sessions, but my recollection is I have voted for every pension bill that has been offered to this House since I became a member of Congress, and I propose to continue to take the same course. I am not objecting to this bill on its merits. I simply desire it shall be considered now and passed.

Mr. RANDALL. Is it not better to pass the bill by a full House than by a House with twenty-five or thirty members present?

Mr. DOCKERY. I think not. However, if the gentlemen interested in this bill desire it I shall withdraw the objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the bill under consideration may be laid aside and voted on in the House under the same order as Senate bill No. 348. Is there objection?

Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR. I regret very much to interpose any objection to the consideration of these bills in a full House. But we have thousands of claimants whose business is set for consideration on Friday afternoons. This, I think, is the fourth bill which it has been proposed to-night to transfer to the Friday afternoon session. This proceeding tends to destroy all action on all other kinds of claims. These bills, it is proposed, shall come up next Friday immediately after the reading of the Journal. I think that was the arrangement. Now, as far as regards making fish of one and fowl of another is concerned the committee did that in this Benham case. It is one of thirty or forty cases, and this distinction is made in regard to it. I shall certainly object in this case.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman as objecting to the request of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON].

Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR. I shall have to do it, though I regret it.

Mr. RANDALL. Then the reason which actuates the gentleman, as I understand it, is that he desires to give these other claims, these war claims, &c., a freer scope on Friday as against pensions.

Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR. That is it. The agreement, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania will allow me to say so, was made before he came into the Hall, so that these cases should be taken up on Friday afternoon immediately after the reading of the Journal. That was the order in the Benham case, and it is now desired that the like order should be made in succeeding cases. That was the order and the agreement made in the Benham case, and it was moved that a like order should be made in the succeeding cases.

Mr. RANDALL. A great many of us here take more interest in these pension cases than in cotton claims or war claims, and I think there ought to be harmony between those who feel on the one side as you [Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR] do and on the other side as I do. I do not think these pension cases interfere at all with the other business, as they are disposed of very rapidly.

Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that I show my willingness to pass these pension cases by coming to these Friday night sessions which are set apart expressly for such cases. I attend all these sessions, and if other members were as ready to come here to discuss these questions as they are to discuss war claims and claims of other kinds we should make better progress. I want to have as much harmony as possible. I want these bills passed. I would have voted for the Benham bill with a great deal of pleasure. I do not know about these other bills, because I was not in the committee when they were considered; but, as my friend from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] says, I am willing to submit to the will of the majority, whether it be in a House of thirty or fifty or three hundred members.

Mr. RANDALL. The difficulty in the Benham case was that the gentlemen here present, being a minority of the House, were not willing to take the responsibility of action upon that bill, and we ask only that the same be done in reference to this bill.

A MEMBER. There was a call for a quorum.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. We are willing to abide by the action of the majority present, but the trouble is that those who are outvoted here are not willing to do that.

The question was taken on the amendment striking out $50 and inserting $40; and it was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is, Shall this bill as amended be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass?

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Chairman, I want the House distinctly to understand that if they pass this bill they are raising to $40 a month a pension which we put at $25 a month, and which we ought to keep at that rate.

Mr. MATSON. The law fixes it at $25 a month.

Mr. PRICE. This bill makes it $40 a month, which the law does not.

Mr. WOLFORD. This bill will be a law if it passes.

Mr. PRICE. But the general law does not fix it at that rate. Now I could object, but I will not. I will put it to the House to say whether they will pass this bill to oblige certain most elegant gentlemen who are not often with us at these sessions, but are here to-night, to beg through a special bill.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, before a vote is taken I wish to protest against making this an exceptional case and giving this widow $40 a month, while the widows of other officers of the same rank who were killed in the war, or who have since died from injuries received in the service, are getting but $25, and other widows but $8 or $12. Ample reasons have been given why this should not be done. The essence of injustice is that you single out one case from many and grant in that case special favors and special privileges.

No reason has been shown here to-night which in my judgment warrants this exceptional action. This was an engineer officer who undoubtedly performed faithful service and was amply paid for his service during his lifetime. Neither he nor his widow have any claim upon us more than thousands of other widows of officers of the same rank. There is gross injustice in a measure of this kind, and I do not believe it would go through a full House, or the House with a quorum; but gentlemen who have an interest in the bills that are placed on this Private Calendar to be considered at these evening sessions come here with their friends for the purpose of voting them through. If it were in order, I think it would be the duty of some member to move that every other widow of an officer of this rank should be placed on the pension-roll at the same rate of pension as this bill gives to this widow.

Mr. WOLFORD. If you move it I will second it. [Laughter.]

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. That would not be in order.

Mr. WOLFORD. It would be right.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. We ought not to forget that somebody must pay these pensions. This Government has no fund out of which it can be paid except as it collects the money from the people who first earn it. It has first to be earned by somebody; and when we remember that the average earnings of the seventeen millions of men in this country who labor for a living is not over $30 per month, out of which they have to support themselves and rear and educate their families, we can appreciate the injustice of granting special pensions of this character.

Is there any more reason why this widow should be pensioned at $40 a month than the widows of other officers who were killed in the service? If there is any such reason, where is it? None has been given here to-night. As my friend from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] has well said, to grant to a major's widow living on one side of the street a pension of $25 a month and to the widow of another officer of like rank living on the other side of the street a pension of $40 a month is manifestly unjust, and for one I shall vote against this bill.

Mr. MAYBURY. Mr. Chairman, I hope the House will indulge me a single moment. I shall not trespass long upon its time.

It has been asked where is the reason for the exception in this case? The reason for the exception is in the fact that this lady is the widow of an officer who died in the service, for, as I have already stated, his death was hastened and, indeed, caused by his faithful discharge of duty in the Army. The reason for the exception is found also in the fact that she stands here as the dependent widowed daughter of a major-general of the Army of the United States. If she stood here to-night not as the widow of Colonel Farquhar, but simply as the dependent daughter of General Williams, what would be the rating of her pension? She would stand before this House to be rated as the daughter of a deceased major-general. What then would be the rating of her pension? There is the ground of the exception in this case.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. In that case she would not have any rating.

Mr. MAYBURY. I ask what would be the rating before the House. I am not speaking of the ordinary rating under the law. I ask what would this House hold her entitled to, she occupying that position as the dependent daughter of a deceased major-general? [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The question being taken on agreeing to the motion to lay the bill aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation, there were—ayes 15, noes 25.

So the motion was not agreed to.

SARAH O. DRUMMOND.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2623) granting a pension to Sarah O. Drummond.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Sarah O. Drummond, widow of John Drummond, a soldier of the war of 1812.

The report (by Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania) is as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred House bill 2623, beg leave to submit the following report:

The claimant, Sarah O. Drummond, filed her claim in the Pension Office May 1, 1879, as widow of John Drummond, and as there was not record and positive evidence of the service of John Drummond as a soldier in the war of 1812, the claim was rejected November 29, 1880. From the papers, evidence, and letters on file in said case there is little, if any, doubt that said John Drummond did service in the war of 1812; that he was taken prisoner and taken to England; afterward returned to this country, and was married to this applicant on the 26th day of August, 1824; had five children, all of whom are dead, two dying in infancy; that she is very poor, aged (about seventy-nine years old), and helpless.

And under all the facts and circumstances of the case the committee recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JAMES WATERS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5074) granting a pension to James Waters.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of James Waters, formerly a member of Captain Weatherbye's company of Pennsylvania militia, and who was in the military service in the war of 1812, to $25 per month, in lieu of the $8 per month he is now receiving under his pension certificate numbered 25506.

The report (by Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania) is as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5074) increasing the pension to James Waters, submit the following report:

The claim in this case is one of merit. The pensioner, James Waters, is about ninety years of age. He draws a pension, certificate No. 25506, of $8 per month. In his letter, under oath, submitted to us, he says:

"I served in the war of 1812; I was born in the year 1797, in Philadelphia; emigrated to Oregon in the year 1843; my health is very poor; my eye-sight is nearly gone; I have no means of support except my pension of $8 per month; I served five years in the regular Army; I served six months in the Florida war as first lieutenant; I served in the Indian war in Oregon in 1847 as colonel; I am not able to do any work; I am badly crippled; will be ninety years old February 22, 1886."

The judge of the county states under oath that he has known Col. James Waters for twenty-five years; that for at least ten years last past he has been in failing health, and suffering the disabilities of extreme old age; feeble in body, almost entirely blind, hearing almost gone; is poor, and has no means of support other than his small pension.

The postmaster of his town states that the old veteran is poor; yes, very poor, and suffering more than the usual amount of the infirmities of life, crippled in body, blind, or almost so, hearing impaired, in fact helpless, and that his pension of $8 per month is entirely too small to furnish him the comforts of life, leaving him without attendance, medical or otherwise.

Your committee see the force of the statement, and admit the necessity of an increase of the pension. They are therefore unanimously of the opinion that said pension should be increased to such a sum as would give this aged and honorable veteran at least a comfortable support during the balance of his few remaining days that he may have to linger on the shores of time, with vision gone, vitality lost, hearing impaired, waiting for the roll-call on the other side. Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ELIZABETH LEFFMAN.

The next business on the Private Calender was the bill (H. R. 5706) granting a pension to Elizabeth Leffman.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Elizabeth Leffman, widow of Lewis Leffman, late an ordnance sergeant in the United States Army, to take effect from the passage of this act.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

At the end of the bill add the words:

"And that she be paid a pension of $30 per month."

The report (by Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania) is as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5706) for the relief of Elizabeth Leffman, beg leave to submit the following report:

Elizabeth Leffman, for whom the pension is asked in this bill, is the widow of Lewis Leffman, deceased, who was an ordnance sergeant, United States Army, who did active, gallant, and meritorious service in the Army of the United States for over forty-three years, at the end of which term he was placed on the retired-list by act of Congress, and has since died. The committee would simply note the language of his commander, Major De Russy, as follows:

"This old soldier is so generally known to the commanders of the Army that any indorsement concerning him seems superfluous. He has served long and most faithfully, illustrating few of the faults and all of the virtues of the veteran. He loves to dwell upon his interviews with distinguished military officers, most of whom, either dead or living, have expressed an interest in him."

General Hancock, in forwarding the papers, speaks of him as "this deserving old soldier."

Your committee deem it a simple act of justice that the widow of—in the language of General Hancock—"this deserving old soldier," she being aged, infirm, and in very needy circumstances, being now about seventy-six years old, be pensioned.

The committee would further recommend that the bill be amended by adding to the end thereof "and that she be paid a pension of $30 per month."

And, as thus amended, your committee recommend that the bill be passed.

Mr. WEBER. I desire to call attention to a clerical error in that report. The term of this man's service should be stated as fifty-three years, instead of forty-three. This is a case unexampled in the history of our country.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I believe this bill proposes simply to place this lady on the pension-roll under the provisions and limitations of the pension laws; but the committee by the amendment propose to give her more than she asks.

The question being taken on the amendment reported by the committee, it was not agreed to; there being—ayes 12, noes 16.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall this bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it pass?

Mr. WEBER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Upon a motion to reconsider, can the merits of this case be stated to the House? I think the amendment would not have been voted down if the case had been understood. I had supposed I would have an opportunity to explain the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that the motion to reconsider is not in order in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WEBER. Have I the right to state the merits of this case?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman to speak upon the bill if he so desires, or the gentleman can move an amendment.

Mr. WEBER. I move to amend so as to fix the rate of pension at $25 instead of $30, as proposed in the amendment of the committee.

Mr. Chairman, I had hoped that a simple statement of this case would be sufficient to commend the measure to the favorable consideration of every member present. I was the more inclined to that belief when I heard the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] say a few moments ago that if this were the only case he would not object. I desire to say this is the only case of its kind; it is unexampled in the history of the country. Sergeant Leffman served his country continuously for fifty-three years. He died about a year ago at the age of eighty-eight, leaving a widow now seventy-six years of age, who was dependent upon him. She is feeble and in needy circumstances.

So meritorious were the services of Sergeant Leffman considered that Congress in 1879 passed a bill placing him on the retired-list with full pay and allowances. I desire to read briefly from the report made in that case. I will not read it all, but only a brief extract:

We venture to affirm that there are but few soldiers in any army in the world of longer service and none with better record. The committee is glad to note the affectionate language of his commander, Major De Russy, in his reference to Sergeant Leffman. It speaks well for both. Major De Russy says:

"This old soldier is so generally known to the commanders of the Army that any indorsement concerning him seems superfluous. He has served long and most faithfully, illustrating few of the faults and all of the virtues of the veteran. He loves to dwell upon his interviews with distinguished military officers, most of whom, either dead or living, have expressed an interest in him."

General Hancock, in forwarding the papers, speaks of him as "this deserving old soldier."

No more graceful or merited tribute could be shown this veteran of more than half a century's service than to grant his petition and retire him on the full pay and allowance of an ordnance-sergeant, and the committee report the accompanying bill and recommend its passage.

Sergeant Leffman was a character well known to the older Army officers, and one to whom they paid as much deference and respect as though he bore stars on his shoulders.

This is a pension to an enlisted man of fifty-three years' service, which entitled him to equally as much recognition, or his widow, as though he had secured a star. It is not a dangerous precedent to establish, Mr. Chairman, because I presume no other case will come before Congress similar to this. We do not ask a pension because she is a widow of a sergeant of the Army, but because she is the widow of a soldier who served fifty-three years—a widow who shared with him through his whole military life the hardships incident to the service—not the case of a wife who lately married a soldier in order that she might enjoy the benefits of his service, but she has shared his trials during that long life of usefulness to the country.

I am willing in this case this favor shall be granted; I am willing that in this case the door be widely opened, for it admits one with a claim unexampled in the annals of the nation, and because I believe we may safely inscribe over its portals "Here may pass every widow who can furnish a record similar to this."

The question recurred on Mr. WEBER'S amendment.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 23, noes 11.

So the amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SAMUEL BAKER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5061) granting a pension to Samuel Baker.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the pension of Samuel Baker, a soldier of the war of 1812, be, and the same is hereby, increased to $20 per month, on account of wounds received in the line of duty while a volunteer in said war.

The report (by Mr. BRADY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5061) granting a pension to Samuel Baker, submit the following report:

Samuel Baker, of Jackson, Ohio, was mustered into the military service of the United States on the 26th day of February, A. D. 1814, at London, Franklin County, Pennsylvania, as second sergeant in Captain Duren's company, Col. James Fenton's regiment, and served through the Canada campaign, participating in all the battles of that campaign until Lundy's Lane, where he was severely wounded, and soon after discharged from the service. He is now eighty-eight years of age and in needy circumstances.

The committee after due consideration report the bill back to the House with amendment, and as amended recommend its passage.

The amendment of the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out the word "twenty" and insert "twenty-five."

Mr. BRADY. I will state, Mr. Chairman, that this is a similar case to the one just passed by the committee.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I thought the gentleman from New York said there was no similar case on record.

Mr. WOLFORD. This is a soldier eighty-eight years old and wounded.

The question recurred on the amendment of the committee.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 9, noes 18.

Mr. BRADY. No quorum. [Cries of "Oh, no!"] This committee passed a bill a few moments ago of the same character, granting $25 a month.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will appoint tellers if the point of order is insisted upon.

Mr. BINGHAM. Do not do that; make your fight in some other way.

The Chair appointed as tellers Mr. MATSON and Mr. BRADY.

Mr. BRADY. I withdraw the point of no quorum.

So the amendment was rejected.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. BINGHAM. Oh, no! Let us go on for ten minutes longer.

Mr. MATSON. What have you got? [Laughter.]

The motion to rise was disagreed to.

SAMUEL C. FISHER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3321) for the relief of Samuel C. Fisher.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Samuel C. Fisher, formerly a member of Company H, One hundred and sixteenth Regiment Indiana State Infantry Volunteers.

Mr. McCOMAS. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. MATSON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3321) for the relief of Samuel C. Fisher, submitted the following report:

Claimant was captain of Company H, One hundred and sixteenth Regiment Indiana Volunteers, and was mustered in the service August 17, 1863, and honorably discharged March 1, 1864.

He filed his application for a pension July 28, 1879, alleging that at Tazewell, Tenn., on the 20th of January, 1864, while serving on detached duty as post commissary, the Union forces were surprised by the confederates before daylight, stampeding the teams; that while in the act of mounting, his horse tramped on his right foot and mashed it severely. He alleges no one saw the injury done, for everybody was looking after their own interests. Claimant was not at any time with his regiment after the incurrence of the injury or in any hospital. His claim was rejected because of no record or satisfactory proof of origin in service and line of duty.

An examination of the papers on file in the Department shows that Thomas D. Cole, Samuel Battinger, John R. Messner, and other neighbors of claimant testify to his having been a sound, healthy man prior to enlistment.

H. C. Frame, private in claimant's company, testifies that at Tazewell, Tenn., in January, 1864, claimant, while in the line of duty, had his right foot mashed by a horse tramping on it. The affiant saw claimant brought to town and saw comrades dressing his wounds. There was no regimental surgeon with the detachment. Claimant was not able to take charge of his company after the injury.

James F. Buckles testifies that claimant was post commissary at Tazewell, Tenn., and he was his orderly. That some time in latter part of winter of 1863 the Union forces were surprised by the rebels one morning before daylight and a stampede took place. Affiant saw claimant immediately after when he was limping. Claimant's horse was shod with heavy shoes.

Lieut. Col. G. O. Behm, of the Sixteenth Indiana Volunteers, says that claimant was acting as post commissary at Tazewell, Tenn., January 20, 1864. On that date the rebels attacked our forces and drove in the pickets, and there was a stampede among the teams, and claimant had charge of the teams at said time and place; claimant was injured as he alleges.

Claimant is unable to furnish any medical testimony of treatment for several years subsequent to the war; the physician who treated him is dead.

Thomas D. Odle testifies that he saw claimant immediately after the war, upon his return from the service in the spring of 1864, when he complained of his foot and leg hurting him; he walked lame, and has ever since; claimant has been unable to perform manual labor.

William Lincoln testifies that when claimant was mustered out he was badly crippled and has been ever since, and can not do manual labor.

Dr. O. D. Benson testifies to being acquainted with claimant twelve years; that he has received a fracture of the second and third metatarsus bones of right foot and most of the phalanges of same foot, causing anchylosis of the metatarso, phalangal articulation, and atrophy of the muscles of the foot. The injury renders claimant unable to perform manual labor.

Dr. De Hart testifies that he has known claimant eight years; he is disabled, as described by Dr. Benson.

Dr. Ross testifies to substantially the same condition of claimant.

Several neighbors of claimant corroborate these witnesses as to the continued suffering from the injury since the war and his inability to perform manual labor.

Special examination conducted at claimant's home in June, 1884, shows considerable diversity of opinion as to when claimant incurred the injury for which he asks a pension.

Your committee have carefully examined all the evidence bearing on the case and believe the injury was contracted in the service and in the line of duty, as claimant alleges. He is an old man, broken in health, and unable to support his family. We therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JESSE H. GAINES.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5234) granting a pension to Jesse H. Gaines.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and instructed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Jesse H. Gaines, late first lieutenant of Company G, Second Regiment Michigan Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. MATSON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5234) granting a pension to Jesse H. Gaines, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

Gaines enlisted May 25, 1861, in Company G, Second Michigan Volunteers; re-enlisted as a veteran December 31, 1863; was captured in action before Petersburg, Va., July 30, 1864, and remained a prisoner of war until April, 1865. Was mustered as first lieutenant May 2, 1865, and honorably discharged July 18, 1865.

On December 15, 1876, he filed an application for pension on account of disease of heart and kidneys. In support of his claim he filed a number of affidavits, to some of which reference should be made.

Capt. George Cook testifies to claimant's soundness up to date of capture, and to his poor health upon return from rebel prison.

Comrade Philip Schneider testifies that he met claimant in rebel prison at Danville, Va., in February, 1865, who then looked emaciated, and that he continued in very poor health during the remainder of his service.

Mrs. Melinda Burt testifies that she was acquainted with the claimant for years before his enlistment; that he came to her house immediately after his release from rebel prison, at which time he looked so emaciated and was in such poor health that she could hardly recognize him.

James Oliver testifies that he met claimant in the fall of 1865, at which time he was unable to perform manual labor.

Claimant received no medical treatment while in the service, hence there is no record of the alleged disabilities. While at home on furlough, and subsequent to his muster-out, he was treated by Dr. Badger, since deceased; consequently no treatment is shown prior to 1868, since which time he has been under treatment for disease of heart by Doctors Clark, Green, Bonine, and others, as appears from their several affidavits in the case. The fact that claimant was treated by Dr. Badger immediately after discharge is shown, however, by the testimony of William J. Oliver, a gentleman of excellent reputation, who states that he was informed by said doctor that claimant then suffered from disease of heart.

The evidence not being deemed sufficient by the Pension Office to warrant favorable action in the case, it was placed in the hands of a special examiner. The testimony taken during the examination is of the highest character. The claimant as well as the witnesses enjoy excellent reputation.

This testimony establishes beyond a doubt that claimant was a sound man at time of his enlistment; that during his confinement in rebel prison his health became seriously impaired; that upon his release he required medical attendance; that disease of heart developed shortly thereafter, and that he has been a constant sufferer therefrom ever since.

Notwithstanding the special examiner's recommendation for the allowance of the claim, it was rejected upon the ground that there is no record, medical, or other satisfactory evidence of the origin of the disabilities in the service and line of duty, or medical or other satisfactory evidence of their existence at discharge or prior to 1867. Much stress is laid by the Pension Office upon claimant's admission that he did not know until probably a year after discharge that he was suffering from disease of heart. Why this frank statement on the part of the claimant should prejudice his rights in the premises, when it is well known that hypertrophy of heart, the disease from which he is suffering, is slow of development and may exist for years without its presence being known or its disabling influences being felt, your committee are unable to see.

The long and meritorious service of this gallant soldier, followed by long confinement in rebel prison, should not be lost sight of in the consideration of this bill; and while your committee fully agree with the Commissioner of Pensions, so far as his action affects the claim on account of kidney disease, yet we are fully convinced of the merits of the claim on account of heart disease, from which claimant is suffering in a great degree, as shown by the medical examinations in the case, and therefore report favorably on the bill and ask that it do pass, in order that he may receive the pension to which he is entitled for disease of heart contracted while in the military service of the United States.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ROBERT E. STEPHENS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5525) granting a pension to Robert E. Stephens.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions of the pension laws, the name of Robert E. Stephens, late of Company K, Seventy-first Regiment Indiana Volunteers (afterward Sixth Indiana Cavalry), at the rate of $36 per month, in lieu of $24 per month heretofore allowed him, as specified in pension certificate 52479.

The report (by Mr. MATSON) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5525) granting an increase of pension to Robert E. Stephens, submit the following report:

Robert E. Stephens was a member of Company K, Seventy-first Indiana Volunteers (afterward Sixth Indiana Cavalry), and was mustered into service July 24, 1862, and discharged on May 25, 1865, on surgeon's certificate of disability for fracture of right radius and ulna, also loss of right index finger by amputation, received in the service and in the line of duty, and for which he is now receiving a pension for total third-grade disability.

In April, 1865, claimant filed his declaration for increase, alleging chronic diarrhea and mucous enteritis of the entire colon, and fecal accumulation of the colon, the results of sickness contracted in the line of duty. The records of the War Department disclose that claimant was in hospital at Lexington, Ky., from September 15 to September 29, 1863, for remittent fever, and from there was ordered to Convalescent Camp, Nelson, Ky., where he contracted chronic diarrhea, for which he was treated and from which he has never recovered. He further alleges he is broken down in health, and has been compelled to give up business by reason of his additional disability. The claim was rejected on the ground that the Pension Office could not grant the increased pension recommended by the board of examining surgeons by reason of the present law.

Claimant files, in support of his claim for increase, the affidavit of Dr. Lewis Shepard, a practicing physician of fifteen years' standing, as follows:

"That since April, 1875, I know that R. E. Stephens has been under medical treatment almost continually. I treated him and advised him to treat with others, who gave him treatment without much relief. His symptoms were distress of the stomach, pains in route of colon, bowels sometimes loose, sometimes constipated, and great nervous depression; also soreness, distention, and uneasiness of some parts of the bowels. Diagonsis, chronic enteritis. He is still suffering from these symptoms."

Dr. Clark Leavitt, a reputable physician of twenty-five years' standing, testifies:

"Was well acquainted with claimant since the war, and a close obsever of his health, and treated him continually for fifteen years since 1865, and that his health was bad. He suffered from derangement of the liver and stomach. I treated his ailments time after time. These inconveniences and pains have been at times very severe, and there is little hope that he will recover from them."

Joseph B. Cheadele testifies:

"Was a member of Company K, Seventy-first Indiana Volunteers (afterward Sixth Indiana Cavalry), and was intimately acquainted with claimant, and was his bunk-mate. He further declares that on or about September 29, 1863, from exposure incident to the service and eating unwholesome food, claimant contracted chronic diarrhea; that he continued to be afflicted at intervals with said disease until discharged, and since then to the present time; that he is now and has been for years a physical wreck, totally disabled from performing labor of any kind. He knew from his own personal knowledge claimant had to decline an excellent business offer more than a year ago on account of his physical afflictions. I was acquainted with him prior to the war, and knew him to be a physically sound and healthy man."

The board of examining surgeons on May 2, 1885, report existence of disabilities alleged in his declaration for increase, and rate them at one-half total.

Your committee are of the opinion that the disabilities alleged were contracted in the service and in the line of duty, and therefore report the bill favorable with the following amendment: Strike out the words "thirty-six" and insert the words "twenty-eight," and we recommend the bill, so amended, do pass.

The amendment of the committee was agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN R. CRAVENS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3308) to increase the pension of John R. Cravens.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of John R. Cravens, who now holds pension certificate numbered 170713, to $30 per month, in lieu of the pension now received by him.

The report (by Mr. MATSON) was read, as follows.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3308) to increase the pension of John R. Cravens, having considered the same, report as follows:

This claimant, the late Lieut. Joseph R. Cravens, enlisted August 8, 1862, in Company G, Ninety-fourth Illinois Volunteers, and was discharged February 22, 1865, and filed his application for pension February 26, 1875, for right inguinal hernia, incurred May, 1863, in Missouri, while in line of duty; was granted a pension on a total rating for said disability June 29, 1879.

The claimant's disabilities having constantly increased, totally disabling him for manual labor, he filed an application for increase of pension for additional disability, neuralgia of head, face, and eyes, vertigo, and loss of sight, as a result of sunstroke received while in the trenches during the siege of Vicksburg, July 1 and 2, 1863.

This latter application was rejected by the Pension Office, on the ground that the disability was probably the result of causes existing prior to his entering the service.

The evidence and papers in this case are very voluminous, the case having been subjected to three or four special examinations.

From the evidence now on file in this case the following facts appear to be clearly proven:

The claimant was entirely free from hernia, neuralgia, or loss of sight prior to enlistment, and that he has suffered continually from hernia, vertigo, neuralgia, and loss of eyesight since his discharge, and in support of these statements the following strong and unimpeachable evidence is given:

First Lieut. M. E. Ferguson, Peter Jacoby, L. D. Taylor, Leroy W. Parks, L. A. Pike, William C. Pike, Chancy Howard, Daniel Rowland, James M. Harly, W. C. Hamilton, A. L. Moore, and Aaron Buckles swear that they were personally and well acquainted with claimant before and at the time of his enlistment, and that he was entirely free from neuralgia, hernia, impaired vision, and vertigo.

Dr. A. F. Cummings, a physician of long experience and excellent standing, testifies that he has known claimant since boyhood, and was his father's family physician from time claimant was fourteen years old. "I was intimately acquainted with him, and about a year of the time he was a medical student in my office. I never knew or heard of his being afflicted with neuralgia, defective vision, or vertigo prior to his enlistment, but personally know he has been a sufferer continually since his return from the Army."

Second Lieut. L. N. Woodcock testifies that he was well and personally acquainted with claimant prior and up to the time of his enlistment, and knows he was entirely free from impaired vision up to the time of and for a year after enlistment, and that after the siege of Vicksburg he was compelled to wear glasses, and complained of pains in the head and eyes, the result of sunstroke at Vicksburg.

Dr. A. L. Stewart, assistant surgeon of claimant's regiment, testifies that he examined him carefully at the time of his enlistment, and at that time claimant was entirely free from hernia, vertigo, neuralgia, or impaired vision. (Standing and veracity of Dr. Stewart verified by the board of surgeons at Bloomington, Ill.)

Colonel McNulty testifies that he was well acquainted with J. R. Cravens prior to and at the time of his enlistment, and that he personally knows claimant was a vigorous and sound man at the time of his enlistment, and that he personally knows J. R. Cravens to have received a sunstroke in the trenches while in line of duty at the siege of Vicksburg, about July 1, 1863, and that claimant, from the result of the same, thereafter became very much enfeebled and disabled, and his discharge finally became necessary as a result of said disability. (This witness's standing and service are verified by the Adjutant-General.)

Lieutenant-Colonel Laughlin, a practicing physician before the war, and now secretary of the board of United States examining surgeons at Bloomington, Ill., testifies that he examined claimant at Vicksburg in July, 1863, and found claimant suffering from the effects of sunstroke, and that claimant afterward became very much enfeebled and debilitated from effects of the same; that he was discharged as being unfit for military duty.

Regimental Surgeon Ross testifies that he was surgeon of claimant's regiment from November 19, 1862, to August, 1865, and that he examined claimant for right inguinal hernia, after a long and tiresome march in Missouri, and found him suffering from the same; and claimant was carried to his tent at Vicksburg July 1, 1863, and was examined by Dr. Laughlin, an accomplished physician and surgeon, who pronounced him suffering from a severe heat (coup de soleil), from which claimant afterward became very much debilitated, resulting in claimant's discharge as being unfit for military service.

Claimant testifies that he was at the time of his enlistment and discharge a practicing physician, and that for three years after his discharge he traveled in the hope of recovering his health, and he, in consultation with physicians he met during his travels, treated himself.

Dr. Laughlin also swears that he knew claimant intimately from 1868 to 1878, and that during that period he was frequently called to examine him, and found him suffering from an affection of the optic nerve and thickening of the cornea, which greatly impaired his vision. Claimant was also suffering from neuralgia and vertigo, a result of sunstroke received at Vicksburg, July, 1863.

Dr. Kaggs also swears to the same state of facts.

Dr. J. T. Jones, late assistant surgeon of the One hundred and thirty-second Indiana Volunteers, testifies that he has known claimant intimately since 1880, and that he has examined him frequently during this period and found him suffering continuously from neuralgia in the head and shoulders and also affecting his eyes, impairing his vision, and vertigo, a result of a morbid condition of the meninges of the brain and upper portion of the spinal chord, as a sequel of a coup de soleil, an that his disability is now continuous.

The board of examining surgeons at Olney, Ill., examined claimant June 14, 1880, namely: Height, 5 feet 6 inches; weight, 124 pounds; age, 50; pulse, 136; respiration, 24; and find claimant suffering from neuralgia, inguinal hernia, vertigo, and defective vision. His condition is such as to render him entirely unfit for manual labor.

The board of United States examining surgeons at Indianapolis, Ind., examined claimant January 31, 1883, namely: Height, 5½ feet; weight, 120; age, 53; pulse, 98; respiration, 19; and find him suffering with right inguinal hernia, neuralgia, vertigo, and impaired vision. They find his disability as described above to be equal to and entitling him to total (¼).

The board of United States examining surgeons, North Vernon, Ind., examined claimant July 7, 1884, namely: Age, 54; height, 5½ feet; pulse, 97; temperature, 99½; respiration, 16; weight, 120 pounds; and they find claimant suffering from right inguinal hernia, severe neuralgic pains in head, eyes, and chest; totally incapacitated for manual labor, his heart very irregular, 103 maximum per minute. They find the disability as above described to entitle him to a third-grade rating.

After a critical examination of the evidence submitted in this case, your committee, in consideration of the clear and incontrovertible evidence of the highest character, medical and from his fellow-officers, showing that claimant was entirely free from the disabilities from which he is now a constant sufferer, and that said disabilities were contracted in the service in line of duty, and that his disability is now permanent and constantly increasing, report the bill favorably, with the recommendation that it do pass, with the following amendment:

Strike out the word "thirty," in line 6 of said bill, and insert instead thereof "twenty-four;" and also strike out the word "John," in line 4, and instead insert "Joseph;" and that the title be amended accordingly.

The amendment of the committee was agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ALMIRA RUSSELL HANCOCK.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5841) granting a pension to Almira Russell Hancock, widow of Winfield Scott Hancock, late a major-general in the United States Army.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll of the United States the name of Almira Russell Hancock, widow of Winfield Scott Hancock, late a major-general in the United States Army, and to pay her at the rate of $2,000 per annum, to take effect from and after the passage of this act, and subject to all the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. SWOPE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5841) granting a pension to Almira Russell Hancock, having had the same under careful consideration, respectfully submit the following report:

General Hancock was an illustrious actor in the critical hours and dark days which overshadowed the history of this country. It will never be disputed that he met all the demands of these great and memorable occasions with a patriotic self-consecration and with a matchless soldiership that was fruitful of good fortune to his country. Recorded results of General Hancock's part in preserving the Union adorn our military annals. Gazetted for skill and gallantry on the earlier battlefields upon which he figured, his record at Gettysburg and in the desperate struggles of the Wilderness is an imperishable and priceless remembrance. Believing in the institutions of his country, he defended them with ardent zeal and at the cost of his blood. On great battlefields, where valor met valor, and where decisive results of war occurred, Hancock was often an eminent figure. There should be no scant gratitude to a soldier who lives in the annals of war for the Union among its most splendid characters.

His death was a source of universal public grief, as his life had been a public blessing. It was followed by quick testimonials in his honor throughout the land. Every form of popular and official demonstration attested appreciation of a heroic defender of the Republic. Enemies whom he overcame in battle are his eulogists in company with the men he led against them.

He has passed into history without challenge of his honor and his success, where honor and success can be successfully challenged if there be flaw in either. Soldiers are judges and critics of soldiers. Before the tribunal of soldiers Hancock's career is already of final record. Of military success he left abundant memorials. Of his magnanimity Americans he defeated in war are cheerful witnesses.

His services were all that could be demanded of patriotic endeavor and devotion. As a type of American patriotism General Hancock will live in the history of his country and in the hearts of his countrymen regardless of sectional or party divisions.

Brave in war, "tender and true" in peace, his sympathies and active benevolence were to the last days of his life freely and almost lavishly expended in behalf of his sick and suffering comrades, their widows and their orphans. No appeal from them ever fell upon his unlistening ear. The very last effort of his life was the dictation of a letter, which he had not strength to sign, making a strong appeal in behalf of the widow of a deceased officer.

Supplementary to this report are papers which are official statements of General Hancock's services to his country; services which his countrymen recognize as the sufficient and eloquent plea for what General Hancock would have wished Congress to do for his widow.

The nature of the service in which General Hancock was engaged, the constant drain upon his pecuniary resources, made necessary by the position he occupied, and the further tax upon his means by his full-handed generosity to unfortunate comrades, has left his widow in straightened circumstances and to some extent dependent on private liberality. This a grateful country should not permit. This committee can not do better than to quote from the report of the Senate Committee on Pensions of the Forty-eighth Congress, which report was ably drawn up by Mr. CULLOM on the bill granting an increase of pension to the widow of General George H. Thomas. This report concludes as follows:

"Although a pension of this amount has only been granted by Congress in one instance, in the case of the widow of Admiral Farragut, excepting the larger pensions to the widows of deceased Presidents, the committee believe that the widow of George H. Thomas should receive the greatest possible consideration at the hands of Congress, and that the unusual and exceptional allowance proposed in her case is a fitting and very appropriate recognition of the nation's indebtedness to her most distinguished husband."

Your committee agree fully with the foregoing sentiments, and considering this one of the exceptional cases in which it becomes their duty to recommend a departure from ordinary precedent and policy, they heartily and unanimously recommend the passage of the bill.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, D. C., February 9, 1886—4 p. m.

To heads of Departments:

Tidings of the death of Winfield Scott Hancock, the senior major-general of the Army of the United States, have just been received. A patriotic and valiant defender of his country; an able and heroic soldier; a spotless and accomplished gentleman, crowned alike with laurels of military renown, and the highest tribute of his fellow-countrymen to his worth as a citizen, he has gone to his reward.

It is fitting that every mark of public respect should be paid to his memory. Therefore it is now ordered by the President that the national flag be displayed at half-mast upon all the buildings of the Executive Departments in this city until after his funeral shall have taken place.

DANIEL S. LAMONT,
Private Secretary.

[General Orders No. 8.]

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE.
Washington, February 10, 1886.

The following order has been received from the War Department:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington, D. C., February 9, 1886.

With profound sorrow the Secretary of War announces to the Army that Maj. Gen. Winfield Scott Hancock died to-day at Governor's Island, in the harbor of New York.

He was born at Norristown, Pa., February 14, 1824. Upon graduating from West Point he entered the Army July 1, 1844, as second lieutenant of the Sixth Infantry. After a short service in the Indian Territory he accompanied his regiment to Mexico and took part in the brief but brilliant campaign which ended in the capture of the Mexican capital. He won a brevet for gallant and meritorious services at Contreras and Churubusco, where he displayed those splendid qualities which, later and in a wider field, placed his name among the great soldiers of our Army. On his return from Mexico he served against the Seminole Indians, and was engaged in quelling the disturbances in Kansas and Utah. Upon the breaking out of the war of the rebellion he was appointed brigadier-general, and soon after major-general of volunteers. His eminent services as commander of the Second Army Corps are inseparably connected with the eventful career of the Army of the Potomac.

A soldier without fear, a citizen without reproach, a patriot without guile, he will ever be a noble and impressive figure in our history; and his countrymen will always recall with pride and pleasure his heroic and inspiring conduct during those last memorable hours on the field of Gettysburg. For his meritorious and conspicuous share in that great and decisive victory he has received the gratitude of the American people and the thanks of Congress.

The flag will be placed at half-staff at all military posts and stations, thirteen minute-guns will be fired on the day after the receipt of this order, and the usual badges of mourning will be worn for thirty days.

WM. C. ENDICOTT,
Secretary of War.

By command of Lieutenant-General Sheridan:

R. C. DRUM,
Adjutant-General.

Official:

J. C. KELTON,
Assistant Adjutant-General.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Chairman, there are two cases, I think, or possibly three precedents, similar to this one—the case of the widow of Admiral Farragut and also of the widow of General George H. Thomas being of this same character. The last case to which I have referred was passed by the last House, and in a full House. I think this case should be passed in that way also. It had better take that course. It is very extraordinary and out of the ordinary field of business of our Friday evening sessions. I believe the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] who champions the bill now presented, the friend of General Hancock, will consent to that course being taken.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, permit me to say that I hope the gentleman from Indiana will make no objection in the present case; for I believe it can be passed, and ought to pass, without an objection in the House to-night. The precedent is so well established in the case of Mrs. Admiral Farragut, to which he has referred, as well as in the case of Mrs. George H. Thomas, wherein the services of these officers, the distinguished soldier and sailor, are almost equally commensurate, that the House of Representatives, in its full session at the last Congress, placed itself positively on record that, when services were so marked and distinguished as in the case of General Hancock, there can be no demurrer or question about passing this bill. There certainly can be no objection where the record of such services as were rendered by the distinguished General Hancock is made up. Therefore, I say I trust and believe we will have no objection to the consideration of the bill now, and without the necessity of formally referring it to the House in full session.

It is a proposition which I believe commends itself to the judgment of the representatives of the people, and I am convinced that it will commend itself to the heart and sympathy and the generosity not only of this House, but of the whole American people. I trust, therefore, the gentleman will not press his proposition, but will allow the bill to pass, as Mrs. General Thomas's bill has been indorsed by a full House, as Mrs. Farragut's has been so indorsed, and that no exception will be made in this case where the services of General Hancock were so pre-eminent.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania is a little too sanguine in his anticipations; and while it is an unfortunate fact that both of the bills referred to by him have been indorsed by both Houses of Congress, it is equally apparent that they have not been indorsed by the people of this country, nor ought they to be indorsed.

I am not a military man, Mr. Chairman, but from the best information I have been able to gather on inquiry from those who are acquainted with the facts, I learn that there has been paid to General Hancock, brilliant, brave, generous, magnificent in all his proportions as we all recognized him to be as a military man, the sum of $165,000 during the last twenty-two years, besides perquisites and other compensation which would make a sum at least equal to one-half the amount which I have named.

Mr. BINGHAM. He helped to save the life of the country.

Mr. PRICE. And so did thousands and tens of thousands of others, as determined, as brave as he, but in a different capacity; men just as deserving, and nothing has been given to their families to keep them from starving. Thousands of them left widows who are not pensioned to this day.

Mr. BINGHAM. My interruption was made in good nature.

Mr. PRICE. A man may speak the words of truth and earnestness, and yet not be angry. I am in earnest upon this question.

The fact is, Mr. Chairman, it is our duty to teach men in high positions habits of economy in their every-day life; teach them to live as my constituents and I am compelled to live, and not encourage them in extravagance. We must teach them to live in such a way that when old age comes, or death comes, they will not depart, leaving their families as pauper pensioners upon the Government that they served, and depend upon it to reward them.

Such a policy as this contemplates is detrimental to the whole principle of manhood and equal rights. Its tendency is vicious and corrupting; for it is liable to create a spirit of reckless, wasteful expenditures. We should rather teach these men to live on a basis of economy; not to live to the utmost of their means, up to their last dollar, indulging in an array of fuss and feathers, champagne and luxury, and then die and leave their families nothing but their dependence upon the Government. I repeat, let them exercise the same economy that I do and my constituents exercise, and then they would be self-supporting and not leave dependent families.

The compensation of a major-general or any other man occupying a high rank in the military service is extremely liberal. It is not so meager that he can not be self-sustaining. I do not know whose measure this is particularly, but I am going to assist in this one effort to break down a system that tends to weaken a man's self-reliance, a system that even the eloquent and distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania can find no excuse for except upon the score of precedents heretofore adopted. He proposes now to increase the number of precedents, and no man can find an argument for it. It shocks every principle of manhood. It violates every known cardinal idea of equal rights and equal justice. It is a principle that tends to create a privileged class, and fosters and induces an expenditure on the part of public men not in harmony with their surroundings or with the principles of simplicity and economy commended by every good man, including Grover Cleveland.

Let me tell you what he says: "Men in official positions should not forget that they are still of the people and may do much by their plain habits of living to inaugurate and encourage a system of economy among the people that tends much to national prosperity." And further: "That the right of the Government to assess the earnings of the people is bounded by the necessities of the Government economically administered."

That one utterance of Mr. Cleveland if crystallized into political action would place his name high among the statesmen of ancient and modern times.

Unfortunately, and it is a marked symptom of the decadence of the times, it has not been put in practice either at the other end of the Capitol or in this House.

A MEMBER (in his seat). O tempora! O mores!

Mr. PRICE. The gentleman should speak louder; I did not hear him. I do not like a man who strikes below the belt. [Laughter.]

I may as well sum up the whole matter in this way: It is cowardly for a man to strike another when he is manacled. It is equally so to take advantage, unless it be absolutely necessary, of the one-man power to defeat the wishes of the majority. But I insist the suggestion of the gentleman from Indiana must be complied with, because that bill can not pass here to-night.

Mr. BINGHAM. I have no desire to antagonize the gentleman who has just spoken. I regret the necessity of taking this bill before the House in its full session. I remember distinctly having heard, and having seen in the RECORD, the same argument and the same speech made by the gentleman one year ago at an evening session in connection with the pension to the widow of Major-General George H. Thomas. In that case the gentleman threw the bill before the House in full session, and the House in full session cordially and willingly by a large majority conceded the $2,000 pension. If the gentleman's position is to be obstructive in this case, of course I must yield. But if the gentleman will withdraw his opposition, I think it would be such a graceful and such a generous act, that I am satisfied the gentleman's own constituents would applaud him.

I had hoped that when this question came before this assembly to-night, convened for the special purpose of passing pension bills, the widow of General Hancock would be allowed to stand side by side on the record as the House has fixed it with the widow of Farragut and the widow of Thomas. Of course I can not object if the gentleman proposes to be obstructive. Only I thought it would be delightful if this thing could be done in a generous way.

I do not know that I can argue this question without losing control of my feelings. For four years I fought and served on the staff of General Hancock. And in a question as to what should be becoming to vote to his widow, I say I regret that by the precedents of this House I am forced to fix the sum at $2,000. The bill introduced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PULITZER] placed the widow of Hancock in line with the widows of the ex-Presidents of the United States. That would be more in accord with my feelings; for, with the exception of Lincoln, I know of no man of modern times who has done more for his country, for civilization, for humanity, for liberty than Hancock has done. [Applause.]

But if the gentleman proposes to place himself in an obstructive position—and I make use of that term honestly and sincerely—I have not a word to say. I trust that he will let this question come before this House to-night, and if it should be determined against me I am willing to accept the alternative. But I do not wish to be put in the position of having to yield to the simple objection of one gentleman.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PRICE] will remember that one year ago, when the case of Mrs. Thomas was before the House, he took exactly the same position; but the judgment, the sentiment, the liberality, and the magnanimity of the House condemned that position. I ask the gentleman to-night to let the case go through as a case of this kind should go through—the tribute of the representatives of the people to the widow of one of the grandest and most chivalric soldiers of our war. [Applause.]

Mr. PRICE. I desire to make a correction of the statements just made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM]. The gentleman evidently labors under a mistake. He is mistaken in saying that I made the same speech here one year or two years ago as I have made this evening.

Mr. BINGHAM. I have your speech here before me.

Mr. PRICE. That the same sentiment is embodied in a speech I may have made here last year or the year before may be true. That speech was made extemporaneously. My remarks to-night have been made extemporaneously. They were made awkwardly I presume then, and they have been made awkwardly perhaps now. But it could not have been the same speech.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania says his feelings will not permit him to take anything else than this. I will tell the gentleman a man's feelings are the poorest guide he can have in legislating. If a sense of duty allowed me to consult my feelings in matters of this kind I would pension them all and give them all $2,000. But we have not got the money; and the strictest necessity requires that we shall treat them all as nearly alike as practicable. If we do not we will be condemned by the people, and if the Government merits and receives the condemnation of the people it will of course grow weaker every day. Pursue this course, and the child is now born that will see our Government broken into a thousand atoms.

I know as a general rule it is a commendable feature in human character to be liberal. But a consideration of that kind ought not to govern us in our action here. We are not voting away our own money. We are voting away the money of the people, for which we are accountable, and we are not justifiable in voting a single dollar unless for value received.

I know the House in the case referred to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania by its vote overruled me. But I know, too, that the gentleman from Pennsylvania two weeks ago had an experience in the case of a pension bill that the sentiment of the people is changing on this floor. Three years ago when I came here first the proposition to increase the pension of a major-general's widow would not have been opposed perhaps by thirty contrary votes. But two weeks ago all the eloquence of the gentleman from Pennsylvania could not obtain the passage of his bill in a full House.

Encouraged by that step in the right direction I have assumed to say here that this case must be submitted to a quorum of the House, and that a higher plane of statesmanship must govern in the disposal of this bill than governed two years ago in the case of Mrs. Thomas.

Mr. RANDALL. What was the suggestion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON]?

Mr. MATSON. I made the suggestion that the bill should be reported favorably, and that when we get into the House it should go over with a number of others to be considered at the session of Friday next.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest Monday instead of Friday.

Mr. MATSON. It was mainly with reference to the business of the committee of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] that I proposed Friday.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR] has objected to this bill being considered on Friday, and therefore I suggest Monday.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, do I understand that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PRICE] really takes the ground that he objects in this case?

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Chairman, I have not come to the place where I can take that ground yet. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] has made a suggestion.

Mr. BINGHAM. Then let us take a vote, and if the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PRICE] is not going to object, we can soon dispose of this bill.

Mr. PRICE. I have not said that I would not object either.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion that this bill be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

CAROLINE STURTZ.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4023) granting a pension to Caroline Sturtz, widow of Jacob Sturtz, deceased.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Caroline Sturtz, widow of Jacob Sturtz, deceased, late of Company G, Twentieth Maryland Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. SWOPE) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4023) granting a pension to Caroline Sturtz, widow of Jacob Sturtz, deceased, late of Company G, Twentieth Maryland Volunteers, having had the same under consideration, respectfully report:

That claimant's husband was pensioned for wound of the neck and lower jaw, and died April 26, 1872, of apoplexy. The medical referee rejected the widow's claim because "there is no reason at all to refer to the wound as a factor in the case. The soldier died, I have no doubt, of cerebral apoplexy, in which the wound has no agency at all." The Secretary of the Interior, to whom this case had been appealed, in his review of it, states:

"The evidence in this case shows that the deceased soldier was a sufferer from a severe gunshot wound of face and lower jaw, and his health by reason thereof has been declining since his discharge from the service; that at the time of his death he was engaged in working over a fire, it being a very warm day, and it is alleged that in consequence of his debilitated condition, resulting from said wound, was stricken down and overcome with the heat, and that the effects of the heat, together with the wound, caused his death. There is no evidence in the case tending to show that the soldier's sudden death was connected as a result with the gunshot wound on account of which he was pensioned. Dr. Rutledge states that had he (the soldier) not been suffering with the wound aforesaid, affiant is clearly of opinion he would not have died, as the work or the heat of themselves were not sufficient to have caused his death."

As your committee has had occasion frequently to observe, it is often a matter of extreme difficulty to trace the consequences either of a wound or a disability through many years of suffering until it results finally in death, and to know exactly how much to attribute to the wound or how much is due to extraneous causes. They are assisted in this case very much by the clear evidence given by Dr. Jarrett, who testifies as follows:

"I was called on to attend Jacob Sturtz on or about the 14th of June, 1865, for wound received while in the Army; said wound was situated in the lower jaw, and was very extensive, involving nearly one-half of the jaw. Caries of the bone took place and a greater part of the bone was discharged in the form of pus, mingled with fragments and ossicula of bone; and I further state that the said wound was in my judgment the primary cause of the said Sturtz's death."

Dr. Rutledge, who was also decedent's physician, states "that he was working over a fire, it being a very warm day, and death was caused partly by the wound and partly by the heat." Here is the evidence of two attending physicians, one of whom states directly that apoplexy was the result of the wound, and the other that it was partly the result of the wound and partly the result of excessive heat. On general principles it may be stated that the direct effects of excessive heat in any given case are dependent largely upon the physical condition at the time of the person who is subjected to it, so that a degree of heat which may be innocuous to a perfectly robust man may produce death in a debilitated and broken-down constitution. Applying this principle to the case in hand, your committee find no difficulty in coming to the conclusion that soldier's death was the result of injuries received in the service, and they therefore recommend that the bill do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CHARLES T. REBER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3831) granting a pension to Charles T. Reber.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Charles T. Reber, late surgeon of the Forty-eighth Pennsylvania Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. SWOPE) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3831) granting a pension to Charles T. Reber, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

This claimant was mustered in October 1, 1861, and was discharged February 23, 1863. Re-entered the service August, 1863, as surgeon United States Volunteers, and was discharged January 29, 1866.

He alleges that in the summer and fall of 1862, while on the campaign in Maryland, he contracted disease of the stomach and liver. He further states that while acting as surgeon, and in line of duty from the Rapidan River to Antietam, from August 14 to October 6, 1862, he contracted inflammation of the stomach and intestines, together with the liver and its appendages, caused by overwork, loss of rest, and insufficient, indigestible food, and that he treated himself for the same until he obtained leave of absence on account of sickness, October 6, 1862. He states further that these ailments have continued, becoming more aggravated with the passage of years, until he is now largely disabled from the practice of his profession and the means of procuring a living. His claim was rejected because of no record or other sufficient evidence of incurrence while in the Army.

The claimant explains the insufficiency of his medical record of treatment while in the service by the fact that, being the surgeon in charge of his regiment, part of the time with no assistance, with great sickness prevailing among the men, he was necessarily obliged to treat himself. He diagnoses his disease as beginning with diarrhea and piles, culminating in an attack of enterocolitis, which compelled him to ask for leave of absence for twenty days. That during the following winter he found he could not endure the fatigue and exposure of active service in the field, and offered his resignation, promising to re-enter the service if able to do so.

After the battle of Gettysburg he did re-enter as assistant surgeon. During said service he had numerous mild attacks of indigestion, biliousness, and diarrhea, but notwithstanding his protests and appeals he was retained in the service until mustered out, January 29, 1866. He goes on to describe how his disease increased in severity, becoming more aggravated, until it resulted in severe attacks of colic, accompanied by decided swelling in right epigastrium and hypochondrium. He mentions quite a number of physicians who have treated him for this affection during the intervening years, some being now dead, and the testimony of others he is, for various reasons, unable to procure. Your committee are satisfied, however, that he was well and hearty when he entered the service; they are also reasonably well assured that he contracted disease as stated from overwork and exposure, and also that it has continued up to the present time.

As to the present condition of claimant the evidence is full and complete.

Dr. D. R. Van Reed testifies that in the spring of 1876 he treated claimant, in consultation with other physicians, for chronic inflammation of the duodenum and gall-ducts, accompanied with spasm of the gall-ducts and bladder, and since then has frequently treated him for same complaints up to the present time.

Dr. William G. Wilson testifies that he has been intimately acquainted with claimant for sixteen years; has seen him almost daily during that time; attended him, in consultation with other physicians, for attacks of colic arising from congestion of liver; that he knows claimant has had other attacks of same nature for which other physicians attended him, and that the debility resulting from these attacks has materially incapacitated him from business pursuits.

Examining Surgeon Barnard, in his examination made in July, 1883, "found a large floating tumor; probably the duodenum involving the duct, and probably the gall-bladder may be implicated."

The full board of examiners made a special and thorough examination of this case, under instructions from Dr. Hood, medical referee. They report:

"We find no evidence of inflammation of the stomach or intestines or of any tumor in the side, but chronic hepatitis involving all the ducts, the stomach, duodenum, and intestines sympathizing. The liver is now abnormally large, indurated, and a little sensitive to the touch, and there has recently been obstruction of the ducts from calculi. The skin is of a deeply jaundiced hue over the entire body, digestion poor, and general nutrition bad. Such paroxysms as he has just passed through occur three or four times a year. The president of this board saw him in one of these attacks about six weeks ago. The pain was very severe. Our opinion is that disability was incurred in the service."

There is no question as to the continuance of the disability since this claimant was discharged from the service, and a study of the history of this surgeon while in the service has convinced this committee that the disability was incurred directly in the line of duty, and also that, from the nature of the case, it would be extremely difficult or altogether impossible to furnish such proof as would meet the requirements of the Pension Office. They therefore report favorably and recommend that the bill do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

FRED. J. LEESE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3624) granting a pension to Fred. J. Leese.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Fred. J. Leese, late of Company M, One hundred and ninety-eighth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. SWOPE) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3624) granting a pension to Fred. J. Leese, respectfully report:

This claimant was enrolled September 7, 1864, and was honorably discharged at camp near Washington, D. C., June 3, 1865. He alleges that while in line of duty at camp near Petersburg, Va., on November 15, 1864, he contracted chronic diarrhea, from exposure to the weather and severe work in the building of fortifications; that he has been a sufferer from said disease ever since. The proof as to his freedom from disease previous to service is satisfactory. After his discharge he mentions the names of three physicians who treated him for chronic diarrhea, but alleges satisfactory reasons why he is not able to procure their affidavits. He has also been procuring from Druggist Weis during the last four years various prescriptions and remedies for chronic diarrhea. Dr. Davis testifies that claimant was an office patient for about eight weeks during the year 1872 and was treated for chronic diarrhea. Dr. Kalloch testifies that he treated him for chronic diarrhea in the year 1871.

Henry Ketzenmoyer testifies that while in military service and in camp near Petersburg, Va., he first noticed soldier's ailment; that he lay sick in his tent, and that affiant made a decoction of white-oak bark and gave it to him to allay and stop his diarrhea, but that it was ineffectual, and then he applied to the surgeon, whose name is, he is informed, H. A. Grim; from that time on he knew applicant intimately and continuously to the present; that he had this ailment at time of discharge and several times since; it is now in chronic condition; that he is not able to do any heavy work and at times is entirely disabled. Charles Y. Levan states that claimant has been in his employ for the past eleven years, "and a more sober and industrious man can not be found; his disease is chronic diarrhea, and ever since he has been with us carries medicine in his dinner-pail, which he must take daily; oftentimes he is compelled to cease work on account of ailment." The board of examining surgeons, January 23, 1884, state that an examination made at that date reveals the following facts:

"Claimant alleges having on an average about five stools per day; when the attack is severe many more, slimy and bloody in character. In general appearance claimant is not of vigorous health, pale complexion, flabby muscles, tongue furred and fissured, abdomen tender and somewhat tympanitic, increased dullness over liver, no definite trouble of spleen. The speculum shows great irritation and inflammation of the rectum."

The testimony shows that claimant incurred diarrhea while in the Army, and that it has continued ever since, interfering materially with his ability to earn a living; and your committee therefore report favorably, and recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. CRISP, as Speaker pro tempore, having resumed the chair, Mr. HATCH reported that the Committee of the Whole House had had under consideration business upon the Private Calendar, and had instructed him to report to the House sundry bills with various recommendations.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bills reported from the Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read the title of the first bill, a bill (H. R. 5506) granting a pension to Emily Louise Spicer.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order. At the last evening session there were four bills passed over informally which I think should take precedence of the bills reported from the committee to-night. What I want to get at is some way of disposing of those bills which were passed over at last Friday evening's session.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will inform the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the bill the title of which has just been reported by the Clerk is the first of the bills passed over informally on last Friday evening.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House make an order in relation to these bills that are now upon the calendar of unfinished business and those which have been reported by the Committee of the Whole House this evening under this special agreement, and that those bills be taken up next Friday immediately after the reading of the Journal, that the previous question be ordered upon the engrossment and third reading of each bill, and that they then be considered. This includes all the bills to which there is any objection.

Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, will that carry out the order that was attempted to be made here to refer these bills for the relief of Mrs. Benham, Mrs. Owen, and Mary Howard Farquhar to the House for consideration on Friday next immediately after the reading of the Journal?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that to be the proposition of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON].

Mr. MATSON. The bill for the relief of Mrs. Farquhar has been reported adversely, and therefore it goes out. The bill for the relief of Mrs. Owen remains on the Calendar, retaining its place. The Benham bill goes over, of course.

Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR. Because a special order was made in regard to the Benham bill; but I understood that that would probably be the last bill which would be referred to the full House for consideration on Friday after the reading of the Journal. I thought that would be the last; but when we got going in that direction to an extent which would cut off all other business I felt it my duty to object, and I shall renew that objection now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There are four bills which have come over from last Friday night's session and two or three that have been reported to-night to which the proposition of the gentleman from Indiana refers.

Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, would it not be well to let the bills go over and take their position at the head of the Calendar next Friday evening, except those as to which the committee has made a special order to-night?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will make known the request of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON], which requires unanimous consent.

Mr. GALLINGER. Under the rules of the House Friday is set apart for the consideration of private business. Now, I happen to be a member of the Committee on Claims, which is devoting from two to six hours almost every day to the consideration of reports. We have now sixty reports on the Calendar; and I shall be compelled to object to this order being made so as to displace the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. McCOMAS. Would the gentleman object if the proposition were so modified as to have the Hancock case considered on Monday and the remaining cases on Friday?

Mr. ROGERS. I desire to suggest what may be a solution of this question. At this late period of the session Monday is not occupied entirely with the introduction of bills. I therefore propose that the previous question be considered as ordered now on these four bills, together with the other three that have been laid aside, so that they will come up next Monday immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. BINGHAM. What are the three bills laid aside to which the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] has just referred?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There were four bills laid aside on last Friday night.

Mr. BINGHAM. What bills have been laid aside to-night?

Mr. MATSON. None yet.

Mr. BINGHAM. Only two, as I understand—the Benham bill and the Farquhar bill.

Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR. I would be glad to have that order made. I know of no objection to it on the part of any one.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that the previous question be considered as ordered on the four bills named, and that they be not voted on to-night, but by unanimous consent be considered on next Monday morning immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. PRICE. I move that there be added to that proposition the Hancock bill.

Mr. BINGHAM. Wait till we reach that.

Mr. PRICE. We are taking up all these out of their order.

Mr. BINGHAM. Then we will take up that in its order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The four bills referred to are first in order. Those four bills were laid aside last Friday evening. The Chair will ask again whether there is objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Arkansas. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

The bills reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar to which there was no objecton will now be taken up and passed.

A bill (H. R. 3624) granting a pension to Fred. J. Leese;

Mr. MATSON moved to reconsider the several votes by which the bills were passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

When the bill (H. R. 5841) granting a pension to Almira Russell Hancock, widow of Winfield Scott Hancock, late a major-general in the United States Army, was reached,

Mr. PRICE said: I ask that this bill be laid aside for a separate vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be temporarily laid aside.

Amendments to the following bills were agreed to, and the bills as amended were severally ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, they were accordingly read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. 704) granting a pension to Benjamin Dubach;
A bill (H. R. 5022) increasing the pension of Isabella J. Ramsdell;
A bill (H. R. 4395) granting a pension to Betsey Martin;

A bill (H. R. 5525) granting increase of pension to Robert E. Stephens;
A bill (H. R. 3308) to increase the pension of John R. Cravens; the title was amended so as to read "A bill to increase the pension of Joseph R. Cravens;" and A bill (H. R. 5306) granting a pension to Roxana V. Rowley and son.

MRS. LAURA HENTIG.

Mr. MATSON. I ask that the bill (H. R. 2464) to increase the pension of Mrs. Laura Hentig be included in the order moved by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS], and that it shall go over until Monday next after the reading of the Journal, to be voted on under the operation of the previous question.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

MRS. E. A. BENHAM.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill (H. R. 229) for the relief of Mrs. E. A. Benham, widow of Bvt. Maj. Gen. Henry W. Benham, deceased, in accordance with the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, will be laid upon the table.

The bill (S. 812) granting a pension to Mrs. E. A. Benham was ordered to a third reading, and it was accordingly read the third time; and the bill went over under the operation of the previous question to be voted on after the reading of the Journal on Monday next under the order of Mr. ROGERS.

ROBERT H. ANDERSON.

The bill (S. 877) for the relief of Robert H. Anderson, of the State of Georgia, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed (two-thirds voting in favor thereof).

ALMIRA RUSSELL HANCOCK.

The SPEAKER, pro tempore. The question next comes up on the bill (H. R. 5841) granting a pension to Almira Russell Hancock, widow of Winfield Scott Hancock, late a major-general in the United States Army.

Mr. PRICE. I move that bill be included in the motion of the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. BINGHAM. State what that order is.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That the bill be considered as having been engrossed and read the third time, and the previous question as ordered on the vote to be taken after the reading of the Journal on Monday next.

Mr. BRADY. Let the Hancock bill be taken up first.

Mr. PRICE. My proposition is that it be included in that order.

Mr. RANDALL. The request of the gentleman is an objection.

Mr. BINGHAM. I want a vote now.

Mr. RANDALL. You can not have a vote if it be objected to.

Mr. BINGHAM. If that is the fact I am perfectly willing to let it be included. If gentlemen will not call a quorum, I desire to have a vote to-night.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In that case the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The question was put, and the Chair declared the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. PRICE. I call for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 25, noes 4.

Mr. PRICE. No quorum.

Mr. RANDALL. The only way to pass the bill is to accede to the request that it be included in the order.

Mr. BINGHAM. I had hoped we would be able to pass it here to-night.

Mr. PRICE. I now suggest by unanimous consent the bill be included in the order, and let it go over to be voted on next Monday after the reading of the Journal.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. MATSON moved to reconsider the several votes by which the bills were passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. MATSON (at 10 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, March 20, 1886.

The House was called to order at 12 o'clock m. by Hon. JOHN B. CLARK, its Clerk.

The CLERK. In the temporary absence of the Speaker, the Clerk has called the House to order, and nominations for Speaker pro tempore are now in order.

Mr. MORRISON. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That CHARLES F. CRISP, a Representative from the State of Georgia, be, and he is hereby, elected Speaker pro tempore during the temporary absence of the Speaker.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. CRISP accordingly took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the Journal.

Mr. BEACH. I object. I think we had better get along with the reading of the Journal to-day and save so much time on Monday.

The Journal was accordingly read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted to Mr. COMSTOCK until March 23, on account of important business.

REFERENCE OF A SENATE BILL.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, under the rule, laid before the House a bill (S. 721) to establish a national live-stock highway and to promote commerce in live-stock between the States; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the special order for to-day.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That House bill No. 5690, for the free coinage of silver, be made the special order for Saturdays, March 20 and March 27 instant, also Saturday, the 3d of April next, and that the same be again taken up on Tuesday, April 6, after the morning hour for the consideration of bills reported by committees, and so to continue from day to day until disposed of: Provided, That, unless sooner ordered by the House, the previous question shall be pending thereon at 3 o'clock, Thursday, April 8. This order not to interfere with revenue or general appropriation bills, except on said Thursday, April 8 next, for the final disposition of this order.

FREE COINAGE OF SILVER.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill which is made the special order for to-day under the order of the House just read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That from and after the passage of this act all holders of silver bullion of the value of $50 or more, standard fineness, shall be entitled to have the same coined into standard silver dollars of 412½ grains troy of standard silver to the dollar, upon like terms and conditions as gold is now coined for private holders; that the standard silver dollar heretofore coined and herein provided for shall be the unit of account and standard of value in like manner as now provided for the gold dollar, and shall be a legal tender for all debts, public and private, except where otherwise stipulated.

SEC. 2. That so much of the provisions of the act of February 28, 1878, entitled "An act to authorize the coinage of the standard silver dollar and restore its legal tender character," as provides for issuing certificates on the deposit of silver dollars, shall be applicable to the coin herein named; and so much of the said act of February 28, 1878, as provides for the purchase of silver bullion to be coined monthly into standard silver dollars, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to adopt such rules and regulations as may be necessary to enforce the provisions of this act.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the report of the minority as well as the majority of the committee be printed in the RECORD in this connection.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The majority report (by Mr. JAMES) is as follows:

The Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, to whom was referred the bill H. R. 5690, submit the following report:

That they have carefully considered the same, and the majority is of the opinion that the passage of such a bill would be injurious to the public interest, and, with an expression of their unqualified condemnation, they report the same adversely, and ask that it be put upon the Calendar.

The views of the minority, submitted by Mr. BLAND, are as follows:

Gold and silver have been used as precious metals, and for the purpose of commercial exchange, from time immemorial, and have, from the beginning of civilization, been recognized as money at certain ratios of value. One of the fundamental principles of metallic money is that nature supplies the volume; the stock on hand of gold and silver throughout the world, together with that which from time to time is being extracted from the mines, constituting the monetary supply. Consequently, the volume is not subject to the control of the legislator.

Without going into the history just at this time of metallic money in the various countries of the world, suffice it to state that gold being used in one country exclusively, silver in another, and still others both gold and silver, as standard of money, constitutes the world bimetallic.

Recognizing this fact, and the further fact that by common law both gold and silver were money in the colonies, our fathers constituted this country bimetallic when they provided that the States should make nothing but gold and silver legal tender for the payment of debts, and by the first act (1792) authorized the coinage of both gold and silver as the full legal-tender money. Also, recognizing the principle that nature, in the manner stated, should supply the volume of money, the only duty that devolves upon the legislator is to establish, by law, the ratio of value for the coinage of the two metals, and to provide for the unlimited or free coinage of both at the ratio established. They opened the mints of the Government to all comers of gold or silver bullion to be stamped or struck into legal-tender coins.

Having done this, the law of supply and demand regulated the volume. This was our monetary system from 1792 until 1873, when, under the pretext of amending the mint act, the provision that authorized the coinage of a legal-tender silver dollar was omitted, and thus, in effect, demonetizing silver.

Without discussing the circumstances under which this demonetization was done or the purposes for which the same was accomplished, it may be said that the act was passed at a time when the country was on a paper basis, neither metal being in circulation. Therefore, it was done at a time when legislation, with reference to the coin circulation of the country, was not likely to attract the attention of the people.

This act was clearly an infraction of the true theory of bimetallism, and in conflict with the Constitution. It assumes that Congress should exercise the power of controlling the volume of money, by prohibiting the coinage of one of the monetary metals recognized in the Constitution. If, under the Constitution, Congress has the power to prohibit or limit the coinage of silver, so it has that of gold.

To admit that it can demonetize one of the metals is to admit that it can demonetize both; therefore the gold monometallists, who are so swift in their denunciations of the Supreme Court for holding that Congress has the power to issue paper legal-tenders, should consider the result of their own theory of monetary science. For, if Congress has the power to demonetize the metals, it must necessarily result in exercising the authority claimed by the decision of the Supreme Court—that is, in printing legal-tenders and forcing them into circulation.

As a constitutional question, it is here claimed that Congress has no lawful right to demonetize either gold or silver; but it is the plain duty to provide for the coinage of both at some regulated value or ratio. The Constitution says "the Congress shall have power * * * to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin." Again, "No State shall * * * make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts."

By the mint act of 1792 the silver dollar as it is now coined—that is to say, a dollar containing three hundred and seventy one and a quarter grains of pure silver, was made the standard of value, and was continued until 1873, when it was dropped from the coinage.

One of the most important questions connected with the restoration of silver to where it was before this change, is the question of the public debt. As compared to gold, silver is now depreciated. It is therefore claimed that it will not be in good faith to our public creditors to pay them in silver dollars. Without going into facts and figures it is generally admitted that the bullion contained in the silver dollar will purchase as many of the necessaries of life at this time, and more, than it would have done when dropped from the coinage; and more than in 1855, or '65, or in '70. Consequently, as compared to commodities, it has not depreciated; but owing to the change in Germany from the single silver standard to the gold standard in 1870 and the suspension of silver coinage by France and other states in the Latin Union, the demand for gold has been very great, and, consequently, compared to silver, its value appreciated. Again, as is well known, the refunding acts of 1870 and 1871 provided for refunding the whole public debt into a coin debt, and that the principal and interest of the bonds authorized should be paid in coin of the standard value of 1870. At that time the silver dollar (412½ grains) was the standard of value, and the coin called for in the bond was that dollar or the gold dollar (25.8 grains), at the option of the Government. There is this inscription on face of bonds of the 5 per cent. funded loan of 1881:

"This bond is issued in accordance with the provisions of an act of Congress entitled 'An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt,' approved July 14, 1870, amended by an act approved January 20, 1871, and is redeemable at the pleasure of the United States after the 1st day of May, A. D. 1881, in coin of the standard value of the United States on said July 14, 1870, with interest in such coin from the day of the date hereof, at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, payable quarterly on the 1st day of February, May, August, and November, in each year. The principal and interest are exempt from the payment of all taxes and duties of the United States, as well as from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority."

Also, on the face of the United States 4 per cent. bond:

"This bond is issued in accordance with the provisions of an act of Congress entitled 'An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt,' approved July 14, 1870, amended by an act approved January 20, 1871, and is redeemable at the pleasure of the United States after the 1st day of July, A. D. 1907, in coin of the standard value of the United States on said July 14, 1870, with interest in such coin from the day of the date hereof at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum, payable quarterly on the 1st day of October, January, April, and July in each year. The principal and interest are exempt from the payment of all taxes or duties of the United States, as well as from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority."

All the interest-bearing coin obligations of the Government now outstanding were issued by virtue of this act, except the 3 per cent. bonds issued under the act of 1881, or since silver coinage was resumed, and are payable in either gold or silver coin. Therefore, to restore the silver dollar and compel its payment in the redemption of these obligations would be no violation of contract or of good faith on the part of the Government toward its creditors.

The opponents of the free coinage of silver insist that because Germany changed her monetary system from the single silver standard to the gold standard, and because France and the Latin Union have suspended the coinage of silver, that therefore it would not be safe for us to restore it; that to restore silver would have the effect of displacing gold from circulation, and we would be placed upon a single silver standard. This matter should receive some investigation and consideration.

It is here claimed, in the first place, that a double standard necessarily implies that the Government adopting it recognizes the principle that the debtors may have the right of payment at their option in the cheaper metal. Gold was cheaper than silver from 1834 until 1873 and afterward, and was used by the people and the Government, and no one ever claimed or pretended that there was any violation of contract or good faith as between debtor and creditor. No one then insisted that the amount of gold in the gold dollar should be increased so as to correspond with the value of the silver dollar. (We think it may be said, possibly, it was because we had no public creditors.)

The restoration of silver here will necessarily give a demand for it that has not existed since 1873, and will have the tendeney to restore it to a parity with gold, and it is believed will so restore it; but whether it be so or not it is insisted that we owe no debt that is not legally and morally payable in silver, and even should we go to a single silver standard no harm would come of it.

The effect of law upon the subject of maintaining the parity of the metals is illustrated by the history of France. That government in 1803 adopted the ratio of 15½ of silver to 1 of gold, giving free coinage to both metals at this ratio. As a consequence that ratio was maintained from 1803 to 1874, when she suspended the coinage of silver. Even the German demonetization did not depreciate silver. The action of the French Government in limiting the coinage and finally suspending it first broke the parity between the two metals.

And right here it may be well to refer to a statement made by Mr. Cernuschi before the United States Silver Commission, in 1876, to a question by Mr. Bogy, as follows:

"By Mr. BOGY:

"Q. By retaining 16 here and 15½ there, our silver would, of course, go right to France. Would not that compel France to abandon the bimetallic system?

"A. The policy of France would be not to coin, but to wait. France committed a great mistake when, in 1874, after the example given by Belgium, she limited the coinage of silver. This has been a great mistake. If France had continued to coin silver freely, the German silver would have flowed into France, and some gold of France would have flowed into Germany, but silver would have maintained everywhere its value relatively to gold. In limiting the mintage a difference has been created between the value of bullion and the value of coin." (See page 37, "Nomism or Legal Tender," by H. Cernuschi.)

This statement of Mr. Cernuschi is a complete answer to a subsequent statement he made in his pamphlet called "The Great Metallic Powers," and on page 21, as follows:

"Why is not the coinage of siver free in France? Because, were the coinage free, all the gold would emigrate, and France, deprived of gold, would no longer have a monetary medium either with England, or with Germany, or with the United States.

"France therefore can not, will not, resume the coinage of silver, unless it be at the same time resumed, firstly, by the United States, and, secondly, by England or Germany.

"Very venturesome would be those who should recommend the United States of America to undertake single-handed what France will undertake only triple-handed."

This pamphlet was evidently inspired by Mr. Manton Marble, who was sent by the Government to investigate the subject in European countries in the interest of the gold monometallists, as this pamphlet seems to have reached every member of Congress with the compliments of Mr. Marble.

Inasmuch as the first statement of Mr. Cernuschi is a complete answer and set-off to the second, we here leave him and his argument thus neutralized.

France, by this unlimited coinage, at the ratio of 15½ to 1, did maintain the parity of the two metals throughout the world from 1803 to 1874, when she ceased to coin silver. This ratio of 15½ of silver to 1 of gold was the great regulator of the parity of the two metals, notwithstanding the enormous output of gold in California and Australia in 1850.

Further illustrating the operations of the French bimetallic law, we quote from Mr. Weston on the silver question, pages 118 and 119, as follows:

"THE LAW OF THE DOUBLE STANDARD.

"When the double standard exists, the debtor pays gold or silver at his option, and of course pays always in the cheapest medium. When the difference becomes appreciable, the actual currency tends to be wholly of this cheapest medium, and the dearer goes to other markets as money, or is absorbed in other uses. This employment as money of the medium which is for the time being the cheapest makes a demand for it, and prevents its becoming still cheaper, or, in other words, prevents its greater depreciation, which it restrains always within reasonable limits.

"We had a memorable example of that between 1850 and 1860, when the new and great supplies of gold from Australia and California came suddenly and simultaneously upon the world. The expectation of a depreciation of gold was general, and this apprehension was so great in Germany and Belgium that those countries actually demonetized gold. The depreciation did not come, and the preventing cause was the steadying effect of the double standard, and notable in France. The actual currency of that country was, in 1850, almost exclusively silver, but it changed very largely to gold when the new supplies cheapened that metal. As Professor Hansen, of the Berlin University, said in 1868:

"'Europe, or rather the whole civilized world, is indebted to French law for its escape from the perturbations in the relative prices of gold and silver menaced by the enormous arrivals of gold from Australia and California. A large part of these arrivals was used in France, where gold replaced silver.'

"W. Stanley Jevons, an English writer of merit, estimates this absorption of gold in the currency of France, down to 1859, at one hundred millions sterling, or nearly $500,000,000. The statements of the gold coinage at the French mints tend to show that the estimates of Mr. Jevons are too low. During the seventeen years of the reign of Louis Philippe, ending at the commencement of the California discovery, this coinage was £8,600,000, or at an average annual rate of £500,000. From 1850 to 1858, both inclusive, this coinage was £129,587,735, or at an annual average rate of £14,343,082. The increase beyond the rate of the preceding seventeen years is £121,000,000. The degree in which gold had replaced silver in the French currency is reflected in the state of the cash resources of the Bank of France, which, in March, 1876, consisted of 1,325,000,000 francs in gold and 495,000,000 francs in silver."

As is stated here, Germany and Belgium, fearing an inundation of gold, demonetized it in 1857. Notwithstanding this demonetization on the part of other states, France continued to coin gold and silver freely, and thus preserved the parity of the two metals during the enormous output of gold in California and Australia.

Another important principle of bimetallism is here brought to view—that is to say, the nation that uses both gold and silver at fixed ratios her people have the advantage of using for the time being the most abundant or cheaper metal, and are not subject to those constant contractions of the volume of money and the depressions of trade incident to the people using the one standard; but the main question to be discussed here is: Would it be safe for this country to coin silver free, Europe remaining as it is? It may be safely assumed that European countries can not further demonetize silver without great disaster to themselves.

Indeed, the discussions now all point to restoring it, not to further demonetize it; and even in Great Britain, a single gold-standard country, her best statesmen and wisest financiers are agitating the question whether or not the bimetallic standard in Great Britain would not bring relief to her starving populations. And so it is in Germany.

Again, all the silver in Europe now in circulation as money is at a par with gold, at the ratio of 15½ to 1; that is to say, it is worth 3 cents more in a dollar there than here, as compared to gold. For this reason, no silver in European countries could come to us should we restore silver to an unlimited coinage at our ratio of 16 to 1; for it is not to be supposed that France, for instance, would be willing to lose $18,000,000 in order to exchange a part of her silver for a portion of our gold, or the whole of it.

Another important matter to consider in this connection is, that our national, banking system is fast going out of existence. The payment of the public debt, rapidly going on, will soon wipe out the foundation of the national-bank circulation, and there must be something to take its place.

On November 1, 1882, the circulation of the national banks was $362,727,747. It is now $315,847,686, thus showing a great contraction in the circulation of the national banks. This contraction for the past year was $15,545,461.

The question is, What is to supply the vacuum created by the retirement of the national-bank notes? We must either issue legal-tender notes to supply it, or else provide for some other system of banking, or else give unlimited use to silver. So the question must be fairly met, Shall this supply be a coin circulation, or shall it be credit money?

We had always supposed that the gold monometallists were the peculiar advocates of hard money—honest money; that the idea of issuing paper legal-tenders of any sort was a dangerous theory to them. If they are sincere and honest in their convictions, then they should join with those who favor the restoration of silver, and demand that such paper circulation shall give way to the unlimited use of silver and gold.

No one will pretend to say that should we restore silver to unlimited coinage there is a possibility of acquiring more than a sufficiency of that metal to take the place of the three hundred and fifteen millions of national-bank notes now rapidly disappearing. The silver certificate is the best substitute for the bank note.

This question may also be regarded in another aspect, and that is, granting that silver should not reach the parity of gold (what is meant by a parity of gold under the process of free coinage is simply that in so far as you give to silver an increased use as money, thus far you release or relieve so much gold), the increased use of silver appreciates the value of that metal.

The decrease in the use of gold, as a consequence in the increased use of silver, will decrease the value of gold, and while silver rises gold will fall and the two will reach a parity midway. But should silver remain 2, 3, 4, or 6 per cent. below the parity of gold, we would be in the same condition we were from '34 to '73, when we were using a gold dollar worth from 3 to 6 cents less than the silver dollar.

The great advantage claimed for gold is, that it is more convenient for large transactions than silver, more portable, and, in proportion to value, easier handled, but now that neither metal is used in large transactions, gold is piled away in bank vaults for bank paper, and in Government vaults for Government certificates. And the same may be said with regard to silver, except in minor transactions. Therefore the advantage claimed for gold is dissipated.

Silver is in circulation here. And so it is even in Great Britain and Germany, and in all other gold-standard countries. Silver is the money of the great mass of the people. It marks the transactions of all retail trade, not only in silver-standard countries, but in gold-standard countries and in double-standard countries. It is therefore the mud-sill of commerce. The business of the world rests upon these silver coins used in retail trade. It is silver that is the money of the world, and not gold.

But were it possible that some new silver mine or silver supply should be discovered by which at once six hundred millions of silver could be dumped down upon us, and our six hundred millions of gold displaced and dumped down upon European countries, it would be a great relief to both hemispheres. The result would be an increase in the monetary supply in European countries of gold that would set the machines of industry in motion, giving the starving laborers of those countries employment, and enabling them to purchase our commodities.

We have had in times gone by a market for our great Western products of corn, wheat, and meats, and in the South of their cotton and sugar, and in the East of their manufactured goods. We want that market again.

The silver placed in circulation here would place us upon a sound metallic basis, revive industries, and put the millions of laboring men now out of employment to work, giving them bread; our revenues would swell, although the taxes would be lighter per capita upon the great masses of the people, because a greater number of them would be enabled to pay taxes. In this way our national debt would soon be a thing of the past. It may be said that those owning fixed incomes, Government bonds, State and railway mortgages, and others who have incomes from these liens would not receive the same amount of labor, or the products of labor, for a dollar they are now receiving; but what they lose in that regard they would gain by sharing in the general prosperity of the people.

Another phase of the question might be alluded to, in so far as our Government debt is concerned. By the act of 1870 that converted it into a coin debt instead of a legal-tender paper debt, providing, as is stated, for payment in the standard dollar (412½ grains) or the gold dollar (25.8 grains), and, inasmuch as at that time silver had unlimited or free coinage, as well as gold, that debt is therefore bottomed on the law of the silver dollar (412½ grains), and on the further law of the free and unlimited coinage of that dollar. Consequently, it is a specific contract, so to speak, payable in the standard silver dollar, and whether that dollar be a legal tender for any other debt or not, the people have a right to pay these bonds in silver at the rate of 412½ grains to the dollar.

Should a proposition be made to pay off these bonds in silver at the rate of 412½ grains to the dollar, not coupled with any legal-tender capacity beyond that, or in the payment of other debts, we would hear complaints and remonstrances from the bondholders. He would demand that his dollar, although a silver dollar, should be received like other money in payment of all debts. And so the people may demand that the public creditor shall be required to take the same money they have to take. Again, as to the question of the free coinage of silver sending gold out of the country, we reply that debtors have the right to demand the free coinage of silver under our Constitution and laws, and especially under the contract with our bondholders, even should we by so doing drive gold out of the country.

On the other hand, it is a violation of the public faith of the Government toward its people, and a violation of the law of 1870, providing for the payment of the bonds in the standard silver dollar, and a violation of the law which existed at that time which gave the silver dollar unlimited coinage, now to limit or suspend its coinage in order to compel the payment of that debt in gold.

While debtors have the legal right, by restoring silver, to demonetize gold, if you please, creditors have no right to demonetize silver in order to compel payment in gold.

But we are constantly being advised to wait the concurrence of Great Britain, Germany, and France, or at least one of those countries, before we further coin silver. England, in 1816, at the instance and advice of Lord Liverpool, not at ours, adopted the single gold standard. Germany, in 1857, at the instance of the bondholding and income aristocracy, demonetized gold. This was done to protect the moneyed interests from what was called the threatened inundation of gold from the California and Australian gold mines. Again, in 1870-'71, for a similar reason, Germany turned about and demonetized silver, in anticipation of the inundation of silver from our silver mines. In demonetizing gold in 1857, then silver in 1870-'71, going back to the gold standard, Germany never took counsel of us or consulted our interests. Just the contrary. Her aim was to outlaw the wealth of our mines—to prevent her subjects from paying the taxes and annuities that supported the ruling classes in the cheap gold of California, and again, in the cheap silver of Nevada. This was done in the face of the fact that these debts were contracted in the very metal each time outlawed.

The practice is sought to be enforced here by the same interests among us. But Germany, unlike us, has no bimetallic constitution; she did have a ruling class.

France never has been hostile to silver. France has about $600,000,000 of silver in circulation to-day, twice the amount we have, yet wealth, population, territory, and all essential demands for money are vastly on our side.

Our fathers, when they adopted a constitutional standard of value based on gold and silver; when they gave free or unlimited coinage to both metals, in 1792 made the silver dollar of to-day the unit of value, the money of account, never entertained the thought of asking the concurrence of other nations. It was too soon after the Declaration of Independence for that. Our mints were always open to the free and unlimited coinage of both gold and silver for eighty-one years. During all this time our public and corporate debts were insignificant. Now our bonded debts are fabulous. They are held by a few who seek to speculate in them by monetary tactics and financial legislation to the end that the value of this particular property shall not only be maintained, but constantly increased—in fact, doubled.

Any one who can not see that our public debts are a menace to our prosperity, if not to our free institutions, is blind. Not a dollar should be held in the Treasury that can be applied to the payment of these debts.

At the expense of being tedious by repeating, we beg again to refer to the French bimetallic law, and thus give an historical instance of the power of unlimited coinage to tie the metals together and maintain their parity at a fixed ratio. France in 1803 adopted the ratio of 15½ of silver to one of gold. France opened her mint to the unlimited coinage of both metals at this ratio. Both were made a full legal tender for all debts, public and private. From 1803 to 1874, over seventy years, France continued the unlimited coinage of the metals, gold and silver. During the whole of this period, and up to the day she closed her mints against the silver of her enemy, Germany, gold and silver were at a parity throughout the world at the French ratio of 15½ to 1. Notwithstanding the fabulous output of gold in California and Australia, coupled with the German demonetization of gold in 1857, before referred to, France continued to coin free, and this prevented the decline of gold feared by Germany. A few French statesmen and financiers were eager for the suspension of gold coinage by France. Among them M. Chevalier, who gave as to gold the same direful prophecies that our chevaliers now predict for the fate of silver.

The French bimetallic law, however, falsified and set at rest all these false prophets and predictions. France refused to demonetize gold in 1857. The victory at Sedan had not then happened. It had happened in 1874. France saw an opportunity for retaliation by closing her mints to German silver—this to hamper and probably prevent the German monetary revolution. It had the desired effect. Germany has been unable to exchange her silver for gold except at a sacrifice she can not make. France will not let her have her gold. Germany can not get it elsewhere. The consequence is Germany is gold monometallic only in name. She is in practice bimetallic to-day, having over $200,000,000 of silver in circulation, alongside of her $350,000,000 of gold. Had France continued the coinage of silver she would probably have most of the $200,000,000 of German silver and Germany a like amount of French gold, but both would have been at par at the ratio of the French 15½. Nobody would have been hurt, for France could spare $200,000,000 of her gold and then have $600,000,000 left—more than England or the United States has to-day—France now having $800,000,000 of the yellow metal. Had France forgotten Sedan and continued silver coinage as she continued gold coinage in 1857, there would be no silver question to solve. The two metals would have remained at a parity. Are we not able to take the place of France in history by coining both metals free?

Let us compare the power of the two countries. France in territory is not as large as the State of Texas with a population of only 37,000,000. We have a territory of over 3,000,000 square miles, or over 2,000,000,000 acres of land, and a population of not less than 55,000,000 of busy people, and increasing at the rate of more than 1,000,000 annually. No limit can be fixed to the numbers our fertile continent will receive and maintain.

The most timid must see that we can dictate the value of silver and gold. We can, at our ratio of 16 to 1—i. e., 16 ounces of silver to be equal in value to 1 of gold—maintain that practical parity by giving both metals equality at our mints.

Undo the wrong of 1873 by restoring silver to unlimited coinage. The example of France warrants us in doing it. Justice to debtors demands it.

The money will be eagerly absorbed by our industrial classes. The gold certificate and silver certificate now circulating side by side at par will continue to do so.

Should the silver certificate displace the bank note, so be it.

The national debt ought to go, and with it, if necessary, the bank note.

Let silver and silver certificates take the place of national bonds and bank notes. We will thus substitute good money for bad, and rid ourselves of an interest-bearing debt—a debt over which all this controversy arises; a debt the manipulation of which has cost us half a billion of dollars. It is at the bottom of all our financial tricks and monetary legerdemain; a constant source of corrupt legislation and downright swindling. With this debt, and the banks on top of it, out of the way, the money of the Constitution will return to bless us.

The mints of our Government are open at all times to the free and unlimited coinage of gold. The miners and the owners of gold bullion have the right to take their gold to the mints and demand its coinage into such pieces as they prefer and the law authorizes; or if they do not prefer to wait for its coinage, they are paid for their gold immediately in cash, rated at the amount it will coin. The mint, therefore, affords a steady, constant, and unvarying market for all the gold that comes.

The gold miner does not produce a commodity to be hauled upon the markets and sold to the highest bidder to run the risks of bulls and bears, the depressions of hard times and falling prices. He extracts dollars and cents, because he can at all times have it coined into money. This money he himself puts in circulation by such investments as he may see proper to make. Not so with the silver miner or owner of silver bullion. Silver is prohibited from free access to our mints. The free coinage of silver that existed from 1792 till 1873 was prohibited practically by the law of the latter year. By that law the coinage of full legal-tender silver was suspended. The subsequent law of 1878 authorizing the coinage of the standard silver dollars limited and restricted the coinage of such dollars. Herein was its defect—a defect imposed upon the friends of silver as a compromise in order to secure any law at all upon the subject.

The law of 1878 authorized the Secretary of the Treasusy to purchase not less than $2,000,000 nor more than $4,000,000 worth of silver bullion monthly, to be coined as purchased into standard dollars. Under this law the Secretary goes into the market to purchase silver at its lowest rates. The Government thus becomes the depreciator or bearer of silver. This makes silver bullion mere commodity, and all that part of the commodity that must wait its turn at the mint is necessarily discounted. Its rate of discount must be in proportion to the time it must probably wait before it can go to the mint. Like all other commodities that fail to find a constant and unvarying price fixed either by law or contract, silver bullion must necessarily fluctuate in value. It must be borne in mind that we refer to the uncoined bullion, for the coined standard silver dollar is now and always has been at a par with gold, because it has always been a legal tender to the same extent as gold. If the mints were open to silver the same as gold, so that all comers with silver could have it coined into legal-tender money, or, if preferred, could demand and receive legal-tender money for it, then, of course, there could be no discount or depreciation of silver bullion below the price paid for it at the mint. All the silver thus coined or exchanged by the owner would be put in circulation by the miner or owner of the bullion the same as gold, and would not be, as it is now, subject to the adverse whims of the Treasury officials, who heretofore have tried how to keep it out of circulation.

This brings us logically to the point that the coinage of silver must be free and unlimited, or placed upon the same footing as gold, in order to preserve the parity or equality in value of the two precious metals.

The gold craze has, however, reached that stage that its advocates tell us it is not safe for us to coin silver free, because, as they allege, it is not the standard of money among a sufficient number of nations for us to adopt it.

What are the facts? We give here tables taken from the United States Silver Commission report of 1877, showing the standard of money and population of the different countries, as follows:

GOLD-STANDARD COUNTRIES.

Great Britain	32,000,000	Germany	42,000,000
Canada, Cape of Good Hope, and Australian colonies	7,000,000	Norway	1,700,000
		Sweeden	4,300,000

SILVER-STANDARD COUNTRIES.

	Population.		Population.
Russia	76,000,000	Peru	3,400,000
Austria	36,000,000	China	400,000,000
Egypt	4,500,000	British India	237,144,456
Mexico	8,000,000
Central America	2,600,000	Total	768,944,456
Eucador	1,300,000

DOUBLE-STANDARD COUNTRIES.

Greece	1,400,000	France	36,200,000
Roumania	4,000,000	Belgium	5,100,000
Colombia	2,900,000	Switzerland	2,700,000
Venezuela	1,600,000	Italy	26,800,000
Chili	1,900,000	Spain	16,400,000
Uruguay	400,000	United States	50,000,000
Paraguay	1,200,000
Japan	33,000,000	Total	187,300,000
Holland	3,700,000

These estimate show that over 700,000,000 people have adopted silver as the sole standard of money, and over 180,000,000 have the double standard, gold and silver, thus constituting a total of more than 900,000,000 who use silver as a standard money. Only 92,800,000 have the single gold standard.

We are the producers of silver. Nearly one-half the world's production of silver comes from our mines. The greater value we give to it at home the more it will be worth abroad and the more value to us our mines become. But the great benefit to be derived from the unlimited coinage or use of silver as a money is in bringing it into competition with gold, so as to lower the value of gold, or, what is the same thing, raising the value and price of all labor and the products of labor, and thus prevent that fall in prices and depression in trade consequent upon measuring all values with the single gold standard, as is now being attempted, the results of which are being felt everywhere. At least four-fifths of the fifty-five or sixty millions of American people desire silver to be restored to its constitutional rights of free coinage. The only classes seriously opposing it are the bondholders or fixed-income class, who scheme for the enhancement of their special property. Bonds, mortgages, and all fixed securities have the amount or value specified in so many dollars and cents. It is easy to increase their real value by increasing the value of the dollars and cents in which they are to be paid. To demonetize silver and require payment in gold only, while it may not change the amount called for in the bond, does double its value by doubling the value of the money in which the bond is to be paid, hence this class, with some honorable exceptions, are opposed to silver. We have also the national banks.

Their interests against silver is tenfold. First, they are required to hold bonds as security for their circulation; they have the bondholders' interest. Again, they seek to control absolutely the volume of money; that they can not do if silver is permitted to fill the channels of circulation.

INCREASING THE BULLION IN THE DOLLAR.

Some of those who favor the bimetallic standard claim that we should change the ratio so as to coin silver at its bullion value. This ignores the fact that silver is depreciated by the Government. Silver was demonetized. That act depreciated silver. It is not coined now except on Government account and in limited amounts. This coinage is utterly impotent to restore silver. What is demanded is that the Government, instead of depreciating silver by its laws, shall throw the weight of its wealth and power in the scale in favor of silver by giving it unlimited use as money. In doing this the Government will simply have righted a wrong. After this has been done, if silver is still below gold to such a degree as to disturb the equity of contracts, there might be a reason for changing the ratio. But it is not justice to the debtor class that his Government should by its laws first depreciate silver and then take advantage of its own wrong by coining it at the ratio of this depreciation. Since 1878 we have been coining full legal-tender silver at the ratio of 16 to 1. All existing debts and contracts are based upon that relation, and especially those incurred since we commenced coining silver.

But this change of ratio may require a reduction of the bullion in the gold dollar, as was done in 1873.

We have always measured gold by silver, and in 1837 reduced the value of the gold dollar. The strange part of the present controversy is that those who talk mostly of increasing the bullion in the silver dollar ignore the fact that it is gold that has appreciated; that the bullion in the silver dollar will buy as much of commodities now as at any time during the last quarter of a century.

Why not then be just to debtors and decrease the value of the gold dollar if any change is required to keep the two metals in concurrent circulation.

We here present a table showing that the proposition to increase the bullion in the silver dollar so as to make it equal to the bullion in the gold dollar will add to the burden of debtors over $2,438,000,000.

This is shown in the following table, by adding 20 cents to the dollar on the total debt ascertained and estimated, namely:

Statement of the national, State, county, municipal, and railroad debt in the United States, and an estimate of the individual real and personal mortgage debt.

United States, 1885	$1,438,542,995
Aggregate State, funded and unfunded, 1885	262,175,245
Territorial, 1880	179,178
County, 1880	123,877,668
Municipal	698,270,199
Railroad, funded, 1884	3,669,115,772
Individual mortgages (estimated)	6,000,000,000
Total	12,192,161,057
20 per cent. increase	2,438,432,211

This statement is taken from Mr. Spofford's almanac, except as to the estimated individual debts, which is gathered from the most reliable sources that can be had, and which is too low rather than too high, and the enormous amount of debt not in the form of liens is wholly left out. Sufficient, however, is stated to show the very great injustice involved in the proposition.

Aside from these considerations, the world's ratio now is 15½ to 1, or a value given to silver of 3 cents to the dollar more than ours.

THE CONSUMPTION OF GOLD AND SILVER IN THE ARTS.

Mr. Burchard, our former Director of the Mint, made a very able and exhaustive research and report upon this subject. In his annual report for the year 1881 he says:

"From a review of the information published in this and preceding reports, and other authorities, I estimate, including the annual consumption in the United States of $11,000,000 of gold and $6,000,000 of silver, the annual consumption of the world in ornamentation, manufactures, and the arts is at least $75,000,000 gold and $35,000,000 of silver."

The greater the wealth of the world, the greater will be the demand for gold and silver in ornamentation and in manufactures and the arts. It may therefore be safely assumed that the consumption will greatly increase from year to year. Indeed, some authorities now estimate the consumption of gold in this way to equal the annual supply, thus leaving nothing to replenish a circulation demanded by the great increase in population and business volume constantly going on. Added to this, the startling fact also appears that more than one-fourth of the world's production of silver is thus consumed. The last annual report of the Director of the Mint gives the production of gold in the world as $95,292,369, and of silver at $115,147,878.

On this showing it is quite apparent that all fears of the country being inundated with silver are wholly unfounded. The Old World must in the future absorb silver to keep up its monetary supply. There is no gold with which to do it. We also must give a larger use to silver if we expect to continue prices even at the present low levels. We have nothing else to take the place of the rapidly disappearing three hundred and fifteen millions of national-bank paper.

LEGAL TENDER.

The most important function of money in modern trade and commerce is its legal-tender power.

If gold only is legal tender, then debtors must depend upon this one metal to pay debts. All the silver and other products of Christendom, except gold, would not pay a dollar of debt unless they could be exchanged for gold. Should the world come to the gold unit as the sole legal tender, that metal might become so valuable, as compared with other commodities, and so scarce in proportion to the enormous demands made upon it, that the money barons of this and other countries, controlling a few hundred millions of gold, might control the destinies of nations and absolutely dominate the welfare of mankind.

Believing that the unlimited coinage of silver is the logical solution of the silver question, and since gold and silver seem to have been the constitutional money intended for the use of the States in adjusting their legal-tender laws, and for other reasons herein stated, and yet others that might be urged for restoring silver to where it was before it was demonetized by the act of 1873, we recommend the passage of House bill No. 5690, which aims at that result. Without indorsing all the statements made in the argument of Mr. Dexter A. Hawkins before our committee, we append the same hereto as containing valuable statistics and data pertaining to the subject herein discussed.

APPENDIX.

(SILVER COINAGE.)

WHAT IS FOR THE INTEREST OF THIS COUNTRY.

Silver and gold have been money since commerce began. It is safe to assume that they will continue to be money so long as commerce exists.

WHAT METALS NATIONS USE.

Of the organized peoples on the globe, those having a population altogether of 800,000,000 use only silver money as unlimited legal tender; those having a population of 200,000,000 use as unlimited legal tender both silver money and gold money; while those having altogether a population of about 100,000,000 use only gold money as unlimited legal tender; but even these last are unable to carry on their industries without a large amount of silver of limited legal tender, with which in fact the retail business is done; and this in amount is necessarily larger than all the domestic wholesale business.

RATIO OF VALUE BETWEEN THE TWO METALS.

In 1785 France fixed the ratio of the relative value, as money, between gold and silver, at one pound weight of pure gold to fifteen and a half pounds weight of pure silver; all Europe soon adopted this ratio and has substantially adhered to it ever since.

We adopted in 1792, in establishing a mint, the ratio 1 to 15, and finding that wrong, we in 1834 changed to 1 to 16; that is the ratio here now. Under the first ratio the gold was exported to pay foreign debts; under the second, up to 1873, the silver was.

MONETARY UNIT.

When the mint was established and began to coin silver and gold, Congress enacted (chapter 12, section 9) that the silver dollar should be the monetary unit of this country. It called this coin "dollars or units," and valued all other coins in these silver dollar "units." No gold dollar was authorized for fifty-seven years (1849); and until there was a gold dollar it was not practicable to have a gold dollar unit. The eagle, for example, was to be of the value of ten of these silver dollar "units," and fractions of the eagle in proportion.

The silver-dollar unit has never been changed a particle in the amount of pure silver it contains. The monetary unit to be an honest unit should not change. The silver dollar remained the sole monetary unit until, without the knowledge of the people or even of the President who signed the act, it was in 1873 demonetized. Then for the first time in eighty-one years it ceased to be our sole monetary unit.

The parties who prepared the law demonetizing the silver dollar evidently were conscious of destroying our sole monetary unit, and of the necessity of enacting some other and new monetary unit to take its place; hence they inserted in section 14 of the act demonetizing the silver dollar that the gold dollar "shall be the unit of value."

Had the gold dollar, as the honorable Secretary of the Treasury mistakenly intimates in his annual report, page xxv, been up to the act of 1873, equally with the silver dollar, our monetary unit, there would have been, on demonetizing the silver dollar, no need of enacting (L. 1872, chapter 131, section 14) that the gold dollar "shall be the unit of value;" for if there had been two monetary units, when Congress destroyed one of these two units, the other unit would still remain. But if only one existed, and Congress destroyed that, there was a necessity of immediately establishing a new unit, and Congress did so.

VARIATIONS IN WEIGHT OF GOLD IN OUR GOLD COINS.

It is well for the good name of the country that Congress did not, before it demonetized silver, give to gold the character of monetary unit. The unit of money should not in weight of pure metal be a variable quantity. The gold dollar varied three times in its quantity of pure metal in the first forty-five years of its theoretical existence. I say "theoretical" for the reason that it had no actual existence till 1849. From 1792 to 1834 the gold dollar was supposed to contain 24.75 grains of pure gold; from 1834 to 1837 it was supposed to have 23.20 grains; and from 1837 up to the time of the first coinage of the gold dollar, 1849, it was supposed to have 23.22 grains of pure gold. In 1849, for the first time, it came into actual existence, and with 23.22 grains of pure gold in it; and it has continued ever since that date when coined to contain that amount.

ERROR IN REPORT OF SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

The claim that from 1792 to 1873 the monetary "unit was embodied by law in either metal" (annual report Secretary of Treasury 1885, page 25), rests simply upon the two facts of unlimited legal tender and legal equivalence of value of gold to silver at certain weights, though one of the metals, gold, changed in weight three times in that period, while silver has not varied at all. Those two facts in law fortunately are not sufficient to embody in a metal the character of monetary unit. It requires a statute to confer that character, and until 1873 such a statute as to gold did not exist.

If legal tender and legal equivalence of one metal to another one which is the monetary unit conferred that character upon the former, then the silver dollar when remonetized in 1878, having both these characters (L. 1879, chapter 20, section 1), would have become the monetary unit equally with the gold dollar. When it was remonetized its former character of monetary unit should by clear terms of the statute have been restored to it, but it was not.

FLUCTUATIONS IN SUPPLY OF GOLD.

Stability in a metal is essential to make it a safe unit of value. Gold, from the changeable quantity of its production at different periods, is unsuited for that purpose.

From 1520 to 1840, three hundred and twenty years, the weight of the gold produced in the world varied from 2 per cent. to 7 per cent. of the weight of the gold and silver together produced. But in 1850 the California mines, and soon after the Australian mines, began to pour out gold in immense quantities, and from 1850 to 1855, five years, the weight of gold produced was 18 per cent.; from 1855 to 1860, five years, it was 19 per cent.; from 1860 to 1865, five years, it was 14 per cent.; from 1865 to 1870, five years, it was 13 per cent., by weight, of the annual joint production of the two metals.

After 1870 the weight of the production of gold fell off to 8 per cent. Silver is much steadier. Take the twenty years from 1850 to 1870; the world's annual output of silver was only twice as great as its annual output in the ten years from 1810 to 1820, while for the former period the annual output of gold was more than sixteen times what it was for the latter period.

A metal so variable in quantity as gold is unsuited to be the unit of value in commerce. It exposes business to a succession of ruinous inflations and contractions, and in the long run, as in England, makes the poor poorer and the rich richer. It introduces an element of chance or gambling into business.

ENORMOUS OUTPUT OF GOLD.

Up to 1875 our country has produced 4,457,420 pounds weight avoirdupois of gold, and Australia 3,986,400. These two countries together had in forty years added to the world's stock of gold 8,443,820 pounds weight avoirdupois, or more than 37 per cent. of the world's production for the last four hundred years.

The United States alone have in the last forty years produced of gold $1,710,000,000, and notwithstanding the great hue and cry about our flood of silver, our output of it was in that period only $710,000,000.

The world's greatest annual output of silver was for the twenty years ending with 1800. It averaged 1,933,932 pounds weight avoirdupois, which, at our ratio of value, 16 to 1, was equivalent to an annual output of 120,871 pounds weight of gold. But in the twenty years ending with 1870, the period of the greatest production of gold, the annual output of that metal averaged 429,327 pounds weight avoirdupois, being for twenty years more than three and a half times in value what it had been of silver for any such length of time for four centuries.

TWENTY YEARS AGO CAPITALISTS WISHED TO DEMONETIZE GOLD.

Had the world been monometallic, with gold alone as the monetary unit, this sudden and enormous increase in the amount of gold would have wrought disaster to the whole creditor interest. Fortunately, except England, it was bimetallic, and yet this large and sudden influx of gold frightened the creditor interests in Europe to such an extent that they began to demand the demonetization of gold. Holland, Belgium, and Portugal demonetized most of their gold coinage or ceased to coin; and Russia prohibited the export of silver lest, if gold were demonetized, she might be left without metallic money. France, always conservative in monetary matters, instead of yielding, as invited, to the gold panic, appointed a commission to inquire into the matter. Finally, in 1865, the Latin Union was formed, that now comprises France, Belgium, Switzerland, Italy, and Greece. This, having a population of over 74,000,000 commercial people in the heart of Europe, acted as a balance-wheel or governor to the European monetary machine in the two metals.

THE STOCK OF GOLD AND SILVER IN THE WORLD.

In 1810, it is estimated by experts, there was forty-five times the weight of silver in use as money that there was of gold. That is, the silver money then at our ratio of 16 to 1 was nearly three times the value of the gold money.

Taking the last estimates of the statisticians and bringing them down to this year, by adding the output of the mines to that date, the amount of money in the world of the two metals is now respectively as follows:

Gold	$3,513,000,000
Silver	3,750,000,000

This gives about 48 per cent. of gold and 52 per cent. of silver as the world's ratio.

WHAT IS THE RATIO OF DIFFERENT COUNTRIES?

If the two metals were relatively evenly distributed, each nation would have nearly as much money of one metal as of the other.

Since Germany attempted to demonetize silver, nations containing about one-twelfth of the organized population of the globe use only gold as unlimited legal tender, while twice as many, those comprising one-sixth of the population of the world, use both gold and silver as unlimited legal tender, and the international commercial relations of these two classes are intimate. Our country for five years was induced to demonetize silver, but now belongs to the bimetallic class.

From all these circumstances combined, notwithstanding two-thirds of the population of the globe use only silver as money, it has come about that while the universal ratio of the two kinds of money in use would be 52 per cent. of silver to 48 per cent. of gold, yet in the above countries that use both there is now a higher percentage than that of gold money and lower percentage of silver money.

France, the head of Latin Union, has in round numbers—

Gold	$900,000,000
Silver	600,000,000
Total gold and silver coin	1,500,000,000

That is, 60 per cent. gold and 40 per cent. silver.

Germany, since she forced a war indemnity of $1,000,000,000 in gold or its equivalent from France and demonetized silver, is reckoned as on a monometallic gold basis; but yet she is practically still bimetallic, for the logic of business is stronger than Bismarck or the statutes; and her money now consists, not of gold alone, but of gold $342,000,000, and silver, half of which is full legal tender, $214,000,000; total, only $556,000,000; or 61 per cent. gold and 39 per cent. silver. Her population is larger than France by seven million, yet she has but a little more than one-third as much money.

The German people have suffered so great financial disasters in the attempt to change from bimetallism to gold that they are now demanding the full restoration of silver. A bill in that direction passed the Reichstag lately.

England, with a population nearly as large as France, has for sixty-five years been on a gold basis; and silver is legal tender only for debts not exceeding $10; but she has all the time been obliged to make constant use of the demonetized metal. Her money consists of gold, $587,000,000, and of silver, $93,000,000; total, only $680,000,000, or not half as much money as France, 86½ per cent. of which is gold and 13½ per cent. of silver. But though kept at this starvation limit of silver by the government refusing to coin more, yet this 13½ per cent. of silver does most of the work—that is, the retail business of that country.

Through her monometallism she has repeatedly lost gold to such an extent that her bank has been unable to replenish its stock of gold promptly from her own people and has sent to the bank of bimetallic France for aid, and has received it.

WHAT IS THE PROPORTION NOW IN THIS COUNTRY?

If to the amounts of the two kinds of money in this country June 30, 1885, as reported by the Director of the Mint, we add the coinage since, and also add the bullion at the mints awaiting coinage, we find that the gold in this country February 1 was $623,000,000, and the silver, including fractional coinage, was $300,000,000; total for 60,000,000 people, $923,000,000; say, 68 per cent. of gold and 32 per cent. of silver.

WHAT PROPORTION IS FOR THE INTEREST OF THIS COUNTRY?

Now, assuming that we do not increase our stock of gold a dollar, so that it remains at $623,000,000, yet to bring our proportion of silver to gold up to the world's ratio of 52 of silver to 48 of gold, we should have now, instead of $300,000,000 of silver, $675,000,000. In other words, we require a further coinage of silver to the extent of $375,000,000; then our proportion of the two metals would be the average of the world. Nations to-day are so intimately connected through commerce, steam, and electricity, that in the long run the world's proportion, instead of a private, peculiar, and abnormal proportion, is the easiest to maintain, and the best.

OUR POSITION REQUIRES THE WORLD'S RATIO.

Our geographical situation makes the world's ratio greatly to our interest. To the east of us are England, Germany, and the Scandinavian countries, about 100,000,000 of people, who are all trying to screw themselves down to a gold basis; and the Latin Union and the rest of Europe, say 200,000,000, that use both metals. Our chief exports to these two classes are food and raw materials, which exhaust our country and enrich them. A small part of these, when manufactured and sent back to us, pay us the purchase price of the whole, and the remainder enables them, at great profit, to supply the rest of the world with goods. If we manufactured these raw materials ourselves, before exportation, it would give employment to millions of citizens and utilize our unlimited supply of coal and water power now lying idle, and create for us immense wealth.

To the south of us on this continent, and to the west of us in Asia, are 800,000,000 people who use only silver and who are the chief market for manufactures and the principal source of lasting profit in foreign trade. Our interest lies in cultivating and developing commerce with them and bringing their trade to our country instead of letting it go to Europe. To do that successfully we must have silver.

A balance of trade against us in Europe calls for gold; while if it arises from transactions with the 800,000,000 silver-using people it will call only for silver.

This fortunate geographical position makes it clear that it is for the interest of this country to attain to and preserve that proportion between the two kinds of money which is the average of the world, and for that reason will be permanent. That will enable us to deal easily, safely, and largely with all the above three classes of nations. Nature has given us within our own borders mines of the two metals that will soon, if we have wisdom enough to coin their products, put us in a position to control exchanges, and make New York, and not London or Paris, the money center of the world.

If the present silver law was executed up to the maximum limit fixed by Congress, in a few years we should have $2,000,000,000 of coin, silver and gold. This would give us nearly the amount per capita as the Republic of France.

AMOUNT OF MONEY REQUIRED IN THIS COUNTRY.

We have now of gold and silver	$923,000,000
United States notes	346,000,000
National-bank notes	318,000,000
Fractional currency, about	7,000,000
Total money for 60,000,000 people	1,594,000,000 or $26 per capita. This is none too much. As the population and business increase we shall need more, not less. France, a much more compact country than ours, and the soundest country in the world financially, and a republic, has in addition to its $900,000,000 of gold and $600,000,000 of silver between $500,000,000 and $600,000,000 of paper, making a total of $2,000,000,000. This is $52 per capita of her population, or twice as much as we have. She does not find that too large a sum. We should not if we had it.

We certainly, then, have not too much money now; and to avoid disaster we must take care that its volume is not reduced.

HOW TO KEEP UP THE SUPPLY OF GOOD MONEY.

With the payment of our debt the national-bank notes, based upon Government bonds, are steadily disappearing. Their place must be supplied by coin or its equivalent; otherwise a contraction of about forty millions a year will follow, and a consequent depression of business and absorption of property by capitalists.

The output of our mines will easily furnish the mints the silver to do this; and it costs the people nothing to buy and pay for this silver, because it may be done in silver coin or coin certificates. In this way, in a few years, our three hundred and eighteen millions of paper money, based on nothing but a promise, and a promise, too, that within twenty-five years last past has been at one time worth only 40 cents silver to the dollar, will become three hundred and eighteen millions of silver dollars, whose weight has never varied in the ninety-four years of their existence, or certificates for coin held in trust by the Government to redeem these certificates at the pleasure of the holder.

The domestic trade of the country, estimated at $25,000,000,000 per year, is now done, and from the habits of our people always will be done, chiefly with paper representing money. These certificates, representing coin in the Treasury, are the best kind of paper money ever devised by man.

So long as the Government buys the silver at the market price and coins it into standard dollars, these dollars within this country necessarily under the present law will have the same purchasing power and paying power that the gold dollar has.

It is the duty of Congress to provide for and secure the business and prosperity of this country and not of foreign countries, and to take care of the $25,000,000,000 of home trade.

Our foreign trade, both imports and exports, is only about 15 per cent. of our domestic trade. Our exports for the last twelve years have paid for our imports and left an average credit balance in our favor of more than $100,000,000 per year. Unless the business of the country is disturbed by legislation in the interest, not of ourselves, but of foreign countries, this credit balance will continue. But if it is disturbed, and a debit balance is produced, this debt will have to be paid to the gold-using countries with gold and to the silver countries with silver; hence the necessity of keeping both in quantities so large that a draft upon either need not disturb our financial position. The coining of our whole available product of both silver and gold will enable us to do this.

The theory that the possession of a large amount of full legal-tender silver is going to make it more difficult, as the gold monometallists say, for us to pay abroad an adverse balance of trade has no foundation in fact. It is pure fiction. Logically it is like assuming that a large corn crop disables us from exporting wheat when there is foreign demand for wheat, or that large wheat crops hinder the export of corn whenever other nations require that cereal. The truth is, the more we have of either the greater is the amount we can pay out or export of the other without inconvenience. If we had only gold, as desired by the enemies of silver coinage, and that departed to pay debts to gold-using nations, we should have no coin left as a basis of our paper money, and that would vary as heretofore from par to 60 per cent. discount; but if we hold both, the temporary departure of one will only bring the other for the time being more into use, and will support our paper and keep our industries active.

COINING SILVER DOES NOT EXPEL GOLD.

Ever since it was discovered that silver in 1873 was demonetized, we have heard steadily from gentlemen who think nothing in finance is right unless it is approved in London, that the restoration of silver to the place that up to 1873 it had always held would be the ruin of this country. The ablest opponent of silver in New York, the late Isaac Sherman, declared the day that the law passed that the act of 1878, restoring silver, would drive out our gold; would precipitate upon us all the United States bonds held in Europe, and would disarrange and prostrate our industries. When told that all monetary history indicated that it would have the opposite effect, viz, that it would bring gold here by increasing our prosperity, that it would help the nation so much by stimulating business, that no foreigner would send home our bonds for sale or payment till he was compelled, Mr. Sherman was quite ready to stake his reputation as a financier upon the result. Well, history and the result are before us.

Germany, in 1873, as soon as she had secured her war indemnity, $1,000,000,000 gold, from France, pursuing the "blood and iron" policy of Bismarck, thought she saw an opportunity to crush France again, financially, as completely as she had already done it on the field of battle by simply discrediting silver. She had emptied France of gold, and now by demonetizing silver she expected to destroy the value of that, which was all the money that was left in France, and so leave her without money except irredeemable bank notes. It was done. The silver of Germany was called in, demonetized, and sold to England in such quantities that in 1876 its price had fallen 20 per cent. The German mints were worked to their full capacity coining the French gold into German marks to supply the place of the demonetized silver. No country ever had so favorable an opportunity as Germany to change from bimetallism to gold. She had reduced the metallic reserve of the Bank of France to $79,000,000, and she held French indemnity obligations falling due that bid fair, she thought, to prevent any gold from accumulating in Paris for many years.

The German gold theorists were in high spirits. But, as afterward in the case of their New York brother, they found that everything went the other way. Silver, which really does the work, being discredited, the German industries from one end of the empire to the other were thrown into confusion; millions of subjects were, from time to time, left in idleness, and it took but a short time for Germany, by beggaring her own industries, to lose more than the thousand millions of gold she had taken from France.

The gold, as fast as she coined it, disappeared to a great extent from the realm and went back to France. Soon the Bank of France was found to hold $400,000,000 of coin, half of which was gold, and much of this gold the new German coins. Finally, to save herself from ruin, Germany has had to stop the sale of silver, and retain in circulation more than a hundred million dollars of full legal-tender silver, besides as much more of the new coinage not full legal tender. To gold theorists this course of things was all wrong, but to the plain man of affairs all right.

After paying the indemnity, France had her silver left. It was by law full legal tender within the republic, and in fact within the whole Latin Union. It does all the industrial work, carries on the retail trade, keeps up both production and consumption. Frenchmen were all busy; Germans were idle. The foreign demonetization of silver did not affect in the least its domestic value and use as money, and France had $600,000,000 of it. The result is that Germany, with seven million more population than France, has now of her thousand millions of gold obtained from France, together with her whole domestic stock, only $342,000,000 left, and only $214,000,000 of silver—total, $556,000,000—while France has $900,000,000 of gold and $600,000,000 of silver; total, $1,500,000,000. The possession of full legal-tender silver helped France to recover back in a short time her whole stock of gold.

Similar results in our country followed the restoration of silver. February 28, 1878, when the silver act became law, the total amount of gold coin and bullion awaiting coinage then in this country was only $228,716,114.

This, according to the gold theorists, should have immediately begun to leave us. Instead of that it has steadily increased, until now, according to the last calculation, we have $626,426,641 of gold, or an increase of about $400,000,000 since 1878. Our Government bonds did not come back except when they were called for payment, and interest was stopped so as to compel their presentation. Our industries were not disarranged or prostrated, but became unusually active and prosperous. In short, as the late Isaac Sherman said to me before he died, everything has happened that to the mind of a goldite should not, and what should has not. Everything in the business world goes just the opposite way from what the opponents of silver teach. Their theories from the very nature of things are wrong. They, as it were, want water to run up hill, notwithstanding ever since creation it has run the other way.

EFFECT OF STOPPING SILVER COINAGE.

The enemies of silver, had they the power, would demonetize it now, as they secretly did in 1873. All their arguments at bottom come to that. They can not accomplish this at once as they did in 1873, because the eyes of the people are now open; hence they modestly demand only the stoppage of its coinage. But their model of perfection and wisdom in finance is England, therefore what they are aiming at is plain. It is to degrade silver, as England has, to a subsidiary coin, and limit the quantity to what we now have.

Half of the coin money in the world is silver. Half of ours ought to be silver. Demonetize it, limit it to what we now have, or degrade it to a token coin, and half the unlimited legal-tender coin money, the measure of value in the world, ceases to be money, but becomes merchandise. The other half has double duty to perform—each dollar has to buy twice as much as now—and prices, from the very nature of things and the necessities of the situation, will be squeezed down, as now in England, until they meet the gold dollar. The debtor will be forced to give twice as much property or labor as now to pay his creditor. No one knows this better than the capitalists, who alone are carrying on this war against silver. Our prosperity would cease, as Germany's did, while we were making the transition. Millions of people would be thrown out of employment; industries would either change hands or be broken up. The property, as in England, would be absorbed by the few, while the many would become mere tenants or day laborers.

In 1876 silver, demonetized by Germany three years before, had fallen as bullion 20 per cent. If we now demonetize it or stop the coinage, which for the future amounts to the same thing, it being one of our great products, we shall throw upon the London market forty millions per year that we ought to coin. Its price as bullion will go down 20 per cent. more. England will get it at 60 per cent., instead of paying 100 per cent. She will ship it to her mints in India, where two hundred and fifty million of people under her rule use only silver for money. She will there coin it at par into rupees and sycee, buy with it from ryots, who work for 8 cents a day, her whole supply of wheat, which she formerly took of us, and land it at Liverpool and London at prices that would bankrupt and starve our American farmers. Her import of wheat from India has in eight years risen to 800 per cent., until it is already in amount one-half of the wheat and flour she takes from us.

An unlimited supply to her from India is only a question of railroads and irrigating canals. Six millions sterling, or $30,000,000, are appropriated there this year for these. She proposes to continue these works till the wheat and cotton lands of India are reached and brought under cultivation. So long as we furnish her with cheap silver she will push this business with the utmost vigor and profit; until, in a few years, if the opponents of silver succeed, our wheat export to England will cease, and English merchants will lay down in New York wheat from India at 75 cents a bushel. Eight years ago she imported from India 4,000,000 bushels; in 1884, over 30,000,000, and last year, 1885, from simply two ports, Kurrachi and Bombay, 33,284,012 bushels, which was an increase in one year from these two ports alone of 11,859,982 bushels.

England has in India a country as large as ours from the Rocky Mountains to the coast of Maine and from the lakes to the Gulf, with three great river drainage areas like that of the Mississippi, extending from the Himalaya Mountains to the Indian Ocean, with every kind of climate from perpetual snow to torrid heat, and every variety of soil, and 250,000,000 of cheap laborers all using silver alone for money. We have only to stop coining silver, break down its price, throw our output at whatever it will bring upon the London market, and in a very few years we not only shall not export a bushel of wheat to England, but all our common grades of cotton will be left on our hands, for she can cause her India subjects, at 8 cents a day, to raise all the short-staple cotton she can manufacture.

With this prospect staring them in the face, and wheat and cotton down to the lowest profit limit, it is not strange that the intelligent people in the wheat-growing and cotton-raising States are opposed to this war on silver. It is a war carried on by English and American capitalists against American labor and prosperity. In this country, fortunately, labor has the intelligence and the votes to protect itself.

SILVER HAS NOT FALLEN IN VALUE.

The function of money is to enable us conveniently to buy the necessaries and luxuries of life; and the true measure of the price of any kind of money, at a given date, is what it will buy of these.

Take a hundred articles of merchandise generally used by man to-day, and a silver dollar or a pound weight of silver bullion will exchange for more of them than at any time in the last twenty years; therefore it is not true that silver has actually fallen; it has really risen. But in the last thirteen years it has not risen so much as gold; so, while as to other things it has risen, it has, relatively to gold, fallen.

If the one hundred millions of people who unwisely demonetized silver were more than the one thousand millions who have not, silver would have actually fallen. Our gold advocates are near-sighted; they can not see beyond Great Britain, though that is not the world; it is not even a continent, but an island that potentially might be dropped into one of our lakes. They are chiefly bankers and their retainers, dealers in foreign exchange, or capitalists who frequently visit or entertain Englishmen, and who live with an eye single to their own interest; they seem to think that what apparently would for the moment benefit them must be for the permanent good of the country. Hence they argue that debts should be paid always in the dearest money, and that money should be made scarce and dear by confining it to gold, so that with their capital they can obtain the greatest possible amount of the products of the labor of others.

The fall in the value of silver bullion relatively to gold bullion has not in any way been caused by an overproduction of silver, for there has been none. This country is the largest producer, and its production of silver for the last forty years has been only $710,000,000, while of gold it was $1,710,000,000. This shows no overproduction of silver, but a very great overproduction of gold; and if we take in the rest of the world the excess of gold production is much greater, for it has for a long period, say from 1850 to 1870, for instance, been three times the production of silver. What, then, has caused silver to fall relatively to gold; or, rather, why has gold risen?

In 1873 Germany, with a population of	40,000,000
Sweden, Norway, Denmark, and Portugal, with	10,000,000
And the United States, with	50,000,000 people, had just demonetized silver and began to scramble and struggle for gold. They changed silver from money with a fixed value to merchandise, and merchandise, too, that had but one market, London, and that market required only the supply for British India, $40,000,000 per year. This was but half the world's production; in fact, it was just about our annual production.

The necessary and inevitable effect was what it always is when twice as much merchandise is thrown upon the market as the market calls for—the price starting in 1873 at 103, fell by 1876 to 80. Gold would have fallen a great deal more than that had these countries demonetized gold instead of silver. Our people by 1876 began to agitate for the resumption of specie payments. They then discovered that Congress, without their knowledge, had demonetized silver and made it impossible to resume in gold alone without great distress. They then demanded the restoration of silver. By 1878 Congress heard the loud call of the people, and it was done. In 1879 specie payments were resumed.

Had the act of 1878 been fully carried out, as Congress intended, everything would have gone on well. Our whole output of silver would have been coined, and by this time we should have had four hundred and fifty million silver dollars as a basis, with gold for currency, instead of half that sum. And England, instead of buying our silver at 80 and paying it at par for wheat and cotton in India, and breaking down the price of ours 20 per cent., would have had to buy her wheat and cotton of us at fair prices.

We lost in the sale of silver as merchandise, and we lost again by having our market for wheat and cotton depressed by this new competitor, where labor is only 8 cents a day.

The same influences and parties that secretly demonetized our silver in 1873 and opposed its restoration in 1878 evidently persuaded the Government to only half carry out the law, and they now clamor for its entire repeal.

These influences and parties are English, not American. Their bodies are with us, and may have been born or naturalized here, but their souls and ideas and principles are English.

WE SHOULD NOW HAVE AN AMERICAN POLICY.

We have been under the tutelage of foreigners and monarchists about long enough. We are of age now. We are numerous enough, rich enough, and intelligent enough to have a national policy, and a political economy, as well as a system of government, adapted to our own needs and geographical position.

WHAT HAS BEEN THE EFFECT IN THE PAST OF ADOPTING ENGLISH POLITICAL ECONOMY INSTEAD OF AMERICAN?

The mint up to June 30, 1885, had coined gold, $1,389,981,508.50; of silver, $434,224,610; total, $1,824,205,118.50. Our mines have produced of gold and silver bullion, not sent to the mint but chiefly exported, $600,000,000. Total domestic product, $2,424,205,118.50; and yet with this enormous production and coinage, exceeding that of any other nation in the world, we had in 1878, when silver was restored, only about $200,000,000 of coin in the country.

When considered from the American standpoint the cause of this is plain: Up to 1876 our industrial and economic laws were so adjusted, having either a low protective tariff or a high one counterbalanced by high internal taxation, so that with few and unimportant exceptions the balance of trade was steadily against us.

EFFECT OF AN AMERICAN POLICY.

But by that date the political intelligence of the people, seconded by acts of Congress, had so adjusted taxation, direct and indirect, that our own industries and people, instead of those of foreign countries, were favored.

The balance of trade then turned and set steadily in our favor until our credit balance for ten years, up to the 30th of June last, amounted to $1,546,300,652, less of course what we have been cheated by the fraudulent undervaluation of goods coming in under the ad valorem clauses of our tariff.

This American policy and the restoration of silver has enabled us to pay a large part of our indebtedness abroad; to call home and pay the United States bonds; to keep at home all our gold and all our silver that the Government would coin; and to draw from Europe on balance $118,000,000 of her gold. In 1881, when we drew from Europe $91,000,000 gold in one year, I had the pleasure of showing through the assay office in New York an English manufacturer who before that had sold largely to this country, but had lost the trade through our making the same goods. He saw lines of drays coming up from the steamer and dumping tons of heavy iron-bound boxes at the door of the assay office. On being told they were sovereigns from the Bank of England he was quite taken aback, and on going through the store-rooms and the subtreasury and seeing $250,000,000 gold and $100,000,000 of silver he remarked with long face that he couldn't understand it.

DUTY OF CONGRESS.

What Congress should do is to let well enough alone, and not disturb our industrial and economic laws that are producing so good results in keeping the balance of trade in our favor and enabling us to retain our gold. Congress should also take care that the Treasury Department in good faith carries out the silver act of 1878 to the full extent of the output of our silver mines, less what is required for the arts. This will require about $40,000,000 coinage of silver a year. This can be done by simply changing one word in the law, namely, two to three, so that the minimum monthly purchase of silver shall be three millons instead of two. That Department should also be required to issue coin or coin certificates for coin in payment for silver bullion, and also exchange certificates whenever called for, so that the volume of our money should not be decreased as the debt is paid.

In paying obligations that call simply for coin the Treasury Department should not be permitted to discriminate against any one kind of coin to the injury or inconvenience of the Government or the people when that kind of coin fulfills the contract.

The demand of the gold monometallists that more silver should be put in the dollar is without fact or reason to sustain it and should not be heeded. We now put 3 per cent. more silver in a dollar than any European nation, and also as much as any other nation. To put in more silver is equally as dishonest as to put in less. The one oppresses the debtor, the other cheats the creditor. Money should remain the same. If the laws as above indicated are carried into full effect, silver in due time will recover its equality of bullion value with gold at our ratio to gold, and in a very few years we shall hold more gold and more silver than any other nation in Christendom; and we shall have a paper currency better than that of the Bank of England, because ours will be based on the two metals, while hers is based on only one, and hence subject to twice as much fluctuation as if based on the two; and the small stock of that one held by England often compels her from time to time to change the rate of legal interest to all points between 2 per cent. and 10 per cent., besides exposing her merchants to periodical squeezes from the distinguished gentlemen who govern the Bank of England.

DEXTER A. HAWKINS.

111 BROADWAY, NEW YORK, February 15, 1886.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, I am informed that there are several gentlemen who have prepared speeches upon this subject and desire leave of the House to have them printed in the RECORD. I would ask unanimous consent that such members as choose to exercise that privilege be permitted to print their remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection that order will be made.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, before I enter upon the subject of debate I desire to say a few words in way of personal explanation.

I am a business man. I am not a lawyer nor am I a professor, neither has my life been closely interwoven with the interests of practical politics, but I have attended to the business of a merchant. It may seem presumptuous, therefore, that I regard my mandate from my constituents in Brooklyn to be a member of this body, and my mandate from the Speaker of this House to serve on the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, as a warrant for taking the time of the House in setting forth and in maintaining my views on the subject now under consideration.

People are more wont to look to the lawyer, to the professor, and to the political leader for light on these questions than to plain business men. But unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, this habit of looking to the lawyers, the professors, and the recognized political leaders does not seem to have produced good results in this matter of the coinage of the silver dollar. We have tried it for eight years nearly, and here we are now in a slough. How are we going to get out of it? That is the question. The car of state is very nearly being ditched. It is not a question of doing something great, it is a question of getting out of something bad. It is not a question of making good time on the road, it is a question of getting the wheels out of the slough. It is a question of making salvage that is before the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures and this House. What are we going to do about it? That is as far as the country has got on the silver question. Things have gone on from bad to worse, and this is the outcome of the leadership of the lawyers, the professors, and the authorized leaders of politics.

It is through these circumstances, Mr. Speaker, that it has been borne in upon me that it is not out of the way for a business man to take a hand in the debate. Without laying claim to anything particularly meritorious I may at least claim to be heard. There is all the more reason for this from the fact that the monetary question is peculiarly a business question. On final analysis—getting down to bed-rock—the monetary question is a question of prices, a matter of buying and selling; and so it is, as I have said, peculiarly a business question.

Then, again, Mr. Speaker, I ask the attention of this House to what I have to say because the business men of the country are, after all, a very numerous and influential class. They need waking up; they need it in my district, they need it in your district. Gentlemen, I am afraid we shall find that they need it in all of our districts.

I wish to be entirely frank about this matter. I am afraid that the business men of the country have not been doing their duty to the country. They have been buying and selling and have let high politics alone, even when high politics affected them most seriously. In this they have failed in their duty to themselves and to the country.

I have no doubt that if the business men had had the power to deal with the silver question the team of State would not have been stalled in the mire as it is now, and it is largely their fault that it is so, for they knew what the end would be. They should have spoken out from one end of the country to the other; they should have insisted that their advice be followed. If I speak, therefore, of business men in my district, of business men in your district, business men in all of our districts needing to be waked up, I do it for the purpose of urging you, gentlemen of the House, to talk this matter over with them as you see them, and to elicit expressions of opinion from them upon this mighty and far-reaching subject. I think it will do good to have this comparison of views.

I want to see the sovereign people performing their functions in this business of money legislation. To handle this question wisely and to the best interests of all we need the advice of the men of business in our constituencies. If my own voice could reach beyond this floor I would gladly see to it that the business men throughout the country should at least have one loud call to join their forces for a righteous handling of this great question. If this could happen, enlightenment and instruction must follow a discussion so general amid a people so sensible and so practical as ours. I believe we should be practically unanimous after hearing from them in voting a measure which would close the current chapters of the history of compulsory coinage. What that measure should be I am here to maintain.

I have given study to the facts which make the theories upon this issue, and have measured the measures proposed with the same spirit of determination to be right which I applied to my own business while in India, where I handled the rupee, or in New York, where I sold the products of the East. The result may be summed up in these words: the so-called demonetization of silver has been from the start a great business blunder. I do no not wish to be misunderstood by either the extreme gold men on one side or the extreme silver men on the other, in my use of this term. I speak of the demonetization of silver. They presumably think I mean the anti-silver law passed by Congress in 1873, and the revision of the statutes in which the silver dollar was spirited away. Well, I do not. Perhaps they think I ought to mean it if I speak of demonetization. I do not think so. I say that I am right and that they are wrong, for it is more than a question of words, Mr. Speaker; it is a question of ideas. In the first place, who demonetized silver? My friends here talk as if the United States had done it.

The so-called demonetization, which is in fact only an effort at demonetization (a partial outlawry of silver) is the culmination of a joint undertaking. The chief quota of outlawry belongs to the nations that controlled most silver and gold. France and her allies of the bimetallic, free-coinage union controlled nearly two-thirds of the metallic money of Europe.

With their alternative free coinage, coining all that came, whether gold or silver, at an express valuation by weight, they held the par steady for generations. England's anti-silver quota had been subscribed and paid so long that it had all been spent. Germany's quota to the fund was very large; in fact the responsibility for the evil results which followed demonetization in Europe is chargeable to the action of Germany.

After the capture of Paris, in 1871, a series of anti-silver and pro-gold laws were enacted, followed in 1873 by direct acts of calling in silver coin to be sent to the melting-pot, and thence to the bullion market. France saw that if she continued the coinage of silver she was simply "bulling" the market for German silver, and was paying out gold for a metal that would become a burden to her if Germany's action should be followed by other nations. She therefore stopped its coinage. The action of France was thought to be necessary, but it was very unfortunate. She felt that she could not afford (by keeping her mints open to silver) to enable Germany to transmute her stock of silver into gold, taking French gold for demonetized German silver. It was not agreeable to France to "bull" silver for Germany's benefit, and face the uncertainties of the monetary future with the added burden to carry off the rejected silver of Germany.

It was said in 1870 by a leading statesman in Europe, Peer-Herzog, that the anti-silver campaign is like a steeple-chase—those that demonetize first will win the prize, and those that come later will pay for all the demonetization that has preceded theirs. Each was, therefore, in a hurry to demonetize for fear the other would demonetize first; each afraid to keep up silver coinage because the other rejected it. The impetus given by Germany's attack was passed along the line, and one after the other of the mints of Europe was closed to silver. Now, when I say this was a business blunder I do not say that it was a blunder of each nation acting by itself and in the sole alternative of keeping up free coinage within its own borders of all the silver that might come, or, on the other, of closing its mints. If it had been a simple choice between these two courses there would seem to have been no way other than to stop.

As the case was presented to France in 1874 and to Holland in 1875 it was the only safe alternative to be pursued. There are occasions in one's business experience when the question arises, "Shall we sell or hold?" Our neighbors, like ourselves, are loaded with the same article; if we sell it is at a sacrifice; if we hold there is a loss; but if we combine and arrange we can all sell at a profit.

But suppose you can not arrange, or think you can not, and therefore do not try, what is the result? You force sales; the bottom is knocked out of the market, and down goes the price. It was a great blunder of the nations as a whole, and it was a blunder of each single nation in so far as that single nation could have stopped the ruinous course of all. No one nation could afford to have the others unload upon it. In point of fact there was neither sense nor reason in any nation trying to unload. It was a blunder to try; each nation as it closed its mints to silver helped to depreciate the stock of silver coin it had on hand, helped to render the money basis of its valuations insecure, and helped to re-enforce the momentum of Germany's attack on the stability of the existing valuations of property throughout the world. The result was insecurity, uneasiness in the money markets, and a great check to business activity.

I am aware that there has been a widespread habit of ignoring these facts. It was fashionable, so to speak, at one time to shout for the single gold standard and for the demonetization of silver. Those who did the shouting do not care at this time to be known. For several years they tried to conceal the harm they produced but they could not. The facts are against them. The business of Europe was done with both metals; by legislative enactment one is stricken down and becomes non-exportable except as bullion. Now, who will presume to maintain that a country like Holland can do business as easily and successfully with its twenty millions of gold, full weight and exportable, and eighty millions of non-exportable because depreciated token money, as with one hundred millions of full-weight exportable money? To depreciate the scope of that eighty millions or, in other words, to strike it with lameness, was bad business. Yet Germany and France had forced Holland into this position, and so she stopped coining silver and took to coining gold, doing what she could to increase her stock of this metal.

The outlawry of silver in Europe reduced a thousand millions of silver to the condition of inexportable, non-international, depreciated money; in other words, to the condition of tokens which are a burden to the state and the business community. Now, all this never would have occurred if there had not been anti-silver laws. Had it not been for these there would have been no depreciation of silver. Hence it is I say that the outlawry of silver was an immense business blunder and a great business loss for each nation affected by it. The story of the last ten years in Europe is a story of business depression unexampled in history, and the main cause of the depression lies where any business man can see it if he takes the trouble to look, namely, in the series of laws in the different states of Europe artificially contracting the metallic basis of valuations and making insecure a foundation which should have been solid.

Gentlemen, do you want evidence of these facts? I doubt if you do. The history of these ten years in each country is one of business crippled, of marking down of prices, and suffering in every direction. You know how it has been in our own country and can imagine how it has been in other countries. Take England as a sample for Europe and read Thorald Rogers and Robert Giffen in 1879 (document of conference of 1878). Read Mr. Goschen's address in Manchester in July, 1885, and Robert Giffen in Contemporary Review for June, 1885; also, recall the fact that a royal commission is to-day investigating the cause of the depression of trade. What it all means for Germany is plainly stated by Baron von Mirbach in an address from which I shall quote later.

But permit me, Mr. Speaker, to bore a little deeper into the facts. Let us look at the state of affairs in Europe as a whole. We see the nations of Europe engaged in a sort of monetary war, each nation laying an embargo upon the silver coin of other nations and upon new silver from the mines. A state of affairs is thus produced which is expensive to their treasuries and injurious to the industries and the trade of each. What is the cause? Practically the start was made by Germany, and was a monetary continuance of the invasion of France. The action of Germany forced the Latin Union to adopt the German embargo on silver; it forced Holland to do the same thing, and France's embargo forced Germany to give up her sales of silver in 1879. I desire to make this thought clear. This anti-silver movement practically involves national hostilities, national pride. But let us go one step further and ask how it came about that Germany forced Europe into this embargo.

Here we touch upon a vast question. Who can measure all the information and prejudice of the savants who sought to control national action? About the time of our war a "craze" seemed to take hold of the economists, and it became fashionable to be an anti-silver man, an anti-bimetallist, a gold single-standard man.

This is the gist of the facts. You can read the story in the books of the conferences from 1867 to 1881. Now, we have heard repeatedly from the extreme silver men that this anti-silver movement has been and is a great conspiracy of the creditor class, of the bondholders of the civilized nations, and that they worked up this sentiment for selfish ends. Such is not the truth. The professors of political economy of a generation which directed thought were not what is called "the servile hirelings of bloated bondholders." These men thought they were reformers, and they meant well, but their foresight was incorrect. They made a mistake. The outcome of their work was an enormous business loss which they had not foreseen, and was consequently a great business blunder.

The end is not yet. We are only in the midst of this craze, which, as has been well said, was the outcome of scientific error, re-enforced by national pride, and uniting the chief nations of Europe in a joint attack upon silver. Now, how is this movement to be reversed? It is a great question; those who have carefully studied the reports of the two international conferences called by the United States can form an idea of the extent and intricacy of the subject. People talk of the lack of success of those conferences. They do not comprehend how vast a matter we were trying to handle; nor do they comprehend the innumerable difficulties in the way arising through national pride, blind selfishness, and a reluctance to being taught which the commissioners had to meet.

Now, let me turn to the question, how has our coinage of the silver dollar operated upon Europe?

I affirm with certainty that it has operated injuriously to the success of the effort to restore bimetallic free coinage. There is one thing, Mr. Speaker, which we may take for granted: there is a good deal of human nature in Europe as well as in America—Europeans are men, and they are not devoid of sense. If you or I were European and lived in the midst of prejudice as general as that which induced the politicians of European nations to commit themselves to an anti-silver policy, and when those great bodies, which move so slowly, had already moved and taken a stand, I think we should consider it a very pleasant thing if a great and wealthy nation across the sea would take hold and help us out without asking any help in return.

The coinage of silver by the United States eased up the situation for the gold monometallists of Europe. The statesmen who committed themselves and their countries to monometallism found allies in the United States, and of this number not one more efficient than the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND]. Outside of what the coinage of silver has been doing all the time, it has been a constant promise for the future that they are to be "let out" more completely. I can not understand, Mr. Speaker, why the extreme silver men fail to see that they are really the cat's-paws of European monometallists. I do not use the word in any way offensively—but it is strong, in so far as they seem to be picking the chestnuts out of the fire. Perhaps there may be a tinge of blind self-interest in the ground they take, or, if that does not suit, let us suppose that they have found the silver question a much more momentous one than they have hitherto contemplated and do not now care to face it in all its diverse bearings. Perhaps they have thought that silver is a "local issue," as a certain distinguished gentleman once remarked with reference to the tariff. If so, they were again mistaken.

It is more than a local issue, it is an international one, and it is because the silver men have failed to comprehend this fact that they have gone on in their blind, selfish advocacy of a financial policy which has operated as disastrously at home as it has abroad, and which threatens at this moment to strike down with paralysis the commercial and industrial interests of the country. With these views and under these circumstances I do not hesitate to say that the coinage under the Bland act has been from the beginning and is now a colossal business blunder. The advocates of the measure proposed and expected it to restore the price of silver, but it has steadily declined as compared with gold from an average price of $52\frac{9}{16}d.$ per ounce in 1878 to an average of $48\frac{9}{16}d.$ in 1885, and at this time it is quoted in London at $46\frac{1}{2}d.$ per ounce. Such are the facts, and here we are with the silver question still on our hands.

If it had not been for the passage of the Bland bill in 1878, I believe that long ere this silver would have been remonetized in Europe, and that in Europe and the United States the mints would have been open to the free coinage of silver as they are to gold, and that the two metals would have been at a parity one to the other at a fixed ratio, as agreed upon.

The true friends of silver, the people who want silver restored to its proper place relatively to gold, as it was before its outlawry in Europe began, all recognize this. They have said it in print continually. The European bimetallists have fought a good fight; they have been in battle array all these years fighting for the cause of silver.

But during these years they have said and felt that the men in the United States who desire to keep up a local silver coinage when other nations have stopped are the enemies of bimetallism. Our bimetallist friends are there carrying on a fight against stupidity in high places, and those who ought to be their friends, who claim to be their friends, are all the time encouraging their enemies to hold out, encouraging them with present help and with promises for the future; in fact, many of these men who called themselves bimetallists have now thrown off the mask and are pronounced silver monometallists, and demand free coinage. Now, Mr. Speaker, these European bimetallists are the men beside whom we ought to stand and with whom we ought to join forces; they are our friends. We ought to help them in their struggle with indifference and prejudice in high places and with the gold monometallists who want the single standard through error or greed.

To do this we must follow the advice of those who know something about the importance of the international side of the controversy, and suspend the coinage of silver, in order that we may help our European bimetallist friends to accomplish that which is of paramount importance to us—namely, the remonetization of silver in Europe. But why have we not done this? Because our people have not understood the question. The silver mine owners, in their greed for present gains, have not looked to the future. They have been content to take the best price they could get for their bullion on a declining market rather than wait until international bimetallism is restored, when their profits would be largely increased. They have kept up a cry against bondholders and the "gold-bugs" of New York whereby they have deceived the people; they have flooded the country with their publications, and have had, as they have now, large sums of money at their disposal for manipulating public sentiment; in fact, they are thoroughly organized, with a headquarters in this city.

The true friends of bimetallism are undoubtedly largely in the majority, but they are scattered and are fighting at odds against an organized force. But I predict that it will be as it was in the days of the "greenback craze," that when the people come to understand the question they will speak out for the suspension of the coinage of the standard dollar as they spoke in no unerring tone at the period to which I refer.

It may be that they will not learn the lesson except by further financial disaster consequent upon continued coinage. But, under any circumstances, this is a campaign in which there can be but one successful issue, namely, the re-establishment of silver in its proper place relative to gold through international agreement. Until this is accomplished there must be no surrender. The fight must be maintained. Coinage under the Bland law must be suspended entirely, for to continue coinage under this law is but organized chaos for the United States.

The continuance of the present law is sure to thoroughly disarrange the monetary system and to further shake public confidence. It is the very indefiniteness of the continuance of coinage without concurrent coinage in Europe that so completely alarms business men; and I say this as a representative of the business interests which are concentrated in and around New York. New York is the commercial and financial center of the nation. That which affects the business interests of New York affects the business interests of the entire country, and vice versa.

With some regret I say that I have often felt chagrined at remarks made upon this floor concerning New York; there seems to be an impression that her interests are inimical to those of the great West and South; that her merchants are moved largely by motives of narrow selfishness, and that it is her "bloated bondholders" who are the conspirators against silver and who are seeking to bring about the single gold standard for their own profit. This is an eminently unfair characterization. There are extreme silver men in New York, in fact I see it charged in certain metropolitan journals that the seat of the agitators (I do not use the word conspirators) for free and unlimited silver coinage is in New York. Undoubtedly there are extreme gold men there also, but during the last two years important lessons have been learned, the subject has been studied in the light of new experience, and to-day New York as a State is pronouncedly in favor of international bimetallism.

So I have said, New York has studied this question in the light of events—and New York stands to-day on the side of the minority in Berlin and the minority in London who are trying to get the majority to surrender the citadel of the single gold standard and so to establish international bimetallism universally. Remember, gentlemen, that New York is a great city, that great cities sympathise with each other and naturally look at many things in the same way. When London was shouting for gold, Paris for gold, Berlin for gold it was quite natural that New York should also shout for gold. I regret that this was so, and think that it was a mistake, but it was a very natural one.

Now, as I have intimated, the great mass of the merchants and bankers are international bimetallists who demand that silver be restored by treaty agreement to its proper place in relation to gold, and these men will not be satisfied until it is accomplished, for they recognize it as the only true solution of the silver problem. They recognize the fact that a gigantic business blunder was committed when silver was stricken down by the European nations, and though some of them may at the time have thought the course a wise one they have long since repented having had any sympathy with it. Gentlemen, there can be no general prosperty upon a sound basis in this country until silver is restored through concurrent action of the nations agreeing to open their mints once more to free coinage at a fixed ratio with gold. The result of eight years' experience has shown to the true friends of international bimetallism that the enactment of the Bland law was a gigantic mistake as it has been the principal hindrance to the settlement of the question upon a broad international basis.

Judge Buckner, of Missouri, who served six terms in this House, was one of the ablest advocates of the Bland bill. In a speech made during the closing days of the Forty-eighth Congress he said:

> Our people are thoroughly bimetallic, and will never be content with a monetary circulation composed exclusively either of gold or silver. Their traditions as well as their interests demand the use of both metals—with the values of each regulated at such ratio as that neither shall be degraded to the condition of a mere money token, and both shall perform their part in the commercial exchanges of the world, on terms of perfect equality.
> This can only be done by the concerted action of the chief nations of Europe with our Government; and to bring about this concert of action the first step must be taken by us, and that step should be to suspend the operation of the silver coinage act for a time, in whole or in part, and at once enter upon negotiations with European nations to establish a fixed ratio of valuation between the two metals, and open their mints to the free coinage of both gold and silver on such terms as may be agreed upon. If we pursue our present policy there is nothing more certain than that the gap between the market value of the two metals will continue to grow wider and wider, and this country will be compelled to make choice between gold or silver monometallism. I would regard either as a great calamity to this country and the world, and I have an abiding conviction that the present is an opportune period for taking prompt and decisive action on this important question.

As a business man, and speaking from a business standpoint, I say that proposition is a sound one. But I desire to be understood that I am not opposing silver; I recognize its importance with gold as a coin of our Government. I have more confidence in it than the distinguished Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], if he meant what he is reported to have said in his speech of January 19. His words are as follows: "Suspension will degrade silver to such an extent that it will cease to be a money metal."

In this one sentence he has given away his cause. He evidently has no respect for the article. In his view the only thing that keeps it a money metal is the coining of two million Bland dollars per month! Preposterous!

If silver had no better advocates its cause would be lost. What, cease to be a money metal when Europe holds a thousand million of it as full legal tender, when it is still the standard of Austria and Russia and when all Asia uses it as money, whether coined or not, to say nothing of Mexico, Central America, and most of the countries of South America! Silver, had it a voice, might well cry, "Save me from my friends" if they be such as the Senator from Colorado.

We can continue the present anomalous law of compulsory coinage of two millions per month, or we can take the panacea proposed by the honorable member from Ohio [Mr. WARNER], permitting the holders of silver bullion of standard fineness to carry it to the Mint and receive therefor Treasury certificates, or the plan proposed by the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], whereby the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to purchase not less than 2,000,000 nor more than 4,000,000 ounces of silver per month, of standard fineness, for which coin certificates are to be issued on the cost of the bullion; we can continue as we are, or adopt either of the above plans or any one of the half dozen other plans proposed, but, in my judgment, they are all but temporary expedients and should not be entertained by the Congress of the United States.

Free coinage is what we want to accomplish, and in my opinion it can only be done through the medium of suspension. So long as this coinage continues and uncertainty exists as to our future course, so long it is easy for European statesmen to put off dealing seriously with the question. But a date for suspension would, as has already been well said, serve as "a notice to quit." Opinion in Europe is reassuring on this point. In Germany the convention of agriculturists has repeatedly discussed the silver question in its general assemblies and expressed itself in favor of the international double standard as being in the interest of German agriculture. During the past year the distress of these interests became so much greater that the executive committee of the convention felt it to be its duty to address an earnest petition to the Diet, and a resolution favoring the international double standard was passed November 12.

Up to January 11 of this year petitions for the "establishment of the international double standard under guarantee of treaty" had been sent to the chancellor and to the Reichstag from two hundred and seventy-eight agricultural associations. These associations (varying in the numbers of their membership) represented all parts of Germany. I find, for example, that all the provinces of Prussia proper were represented; all the provinces of Saxony, Lübeck, Hanover, Anhalt, Westphalia, Schleswig-Holstein, Würtemburg, Bavaria; in fact all parts of Germany. In all eight hundred petitions had come to the chancellor and the Reichstag up to a recent date praying for the international double standard. That the pressure in Germany is very strong we are getting evidences almost daily. On January 22 a remarkable speech was delivered by Finance Minister Scholz before the Landtag. Among other things he said:

> I have therefore observed with some regret how wide a circle has been drawn into sympathy with this agitation, and especially that the agricultural interest, now in a pitiful condition, which demands our sympathy, has been led to hope that it can find therein the means of bettering its existence.

Of course Mr. Scholz being a minister of finance puts on a brave front as a gold monometallist, but he said of himself that he was not "a fanatical advocate of the single gold standard," and that he was "not insensible to the heavy losses which had been incurred by the demonetization of silver." Baron Von Mirbach (to whom I have already referred), a nobleman of Eastern Prussia and a leading member of the Diet, in an address to the people of Germany entitled "The serious injury done by the gold standard to those engaged in agriculture, in the mechanical arts, to manufactures, to laborers, to all who labor with hand and mind," says:

> The establishment of the gold standard in Germany was a serious mistake, as the chancellor of the empire himself has said. It cost the country, that is the tax-payers, over 70,000,000 marks (seventeen and a half million dollars), and injured the entire population that lives by labor, and benefited only those who had money.

If Prince Bismarck had not stopped the further sale of the thalers (silver) in the year 1879 we should have suffered more than twice the loss already borne.

And further:

It is true that most people do not understand the monetary question, and this is so much to be lamented, for no question is of such far-reaching, practical importance for the weal or woe of all classes of labor, nay for the happiness of the citizen. It is much more important than the question of protection, in fact than all the issues of economic politics, which are so much discussed to-day. If it were only understood by the majority of the people they would raise a storm which would sweep the gold standard away as wind sweeps away chaff.

Dr. Otto Arendt, secretary of the "German association for the double standard under guarantee of treaty," writes, under date of January 12, 1886:

We need both metals. The equilibrium between them has been broken by the experiment of the gold standard. No single state is in position to restore that equilibrium; an international agreement is necessary. All states except England are ready for such an agreement if Germany decides to join. If we leave this one nation in its isolation the monetary problem which seems so difficult will be solved. Future generations will instance among the greatest aberrations of the human mind the idea and the experiment of the gold standard which has brought such unspeakable misery upon the world.

On February 11 a Reuter telegram from Berlin stated that the motion introduced by Herr Huene in the Reichstag on behalf of the conservatives, urging a new and searching inquiry into the currency question, with a view to ascertaining whether it would be better to adhere to monometallism or return to a double standard, was adopted by a vote of 145 to 119. The result is a great triumph for the international bimetallists. Gentlemen, I could produce evidence almost indefinitely to show that Germany is alive to the importance of a settlement of this question, and with a little more pressure would be ready to agree to an arrangement, but so long as we are bound by law to continue indefinitely to grind out at least two millions of Bland dollars per month we greatly retard if we do not directly prevent success. With one more quotation from Minister of Finance Scholz I will make no further reference to Germany.

In the speech to which I have already referred he alluded to the embarrassments of the United States, from which, he said with pride, that Germany was free, because she had stopped the coinage of silver. Is it not obvious that it is desirable that we now enter upon a course whereby we may be relieved and shift the embarrassment upon them; in other words, allow Germany to "lie awake nights" over the silver question instead of continuing to do so ourselves? To me everything indicates that Germany is in a condition where pressure is sure of producing a favorable result.

Turning to France, I think I am safe in saying that, judging from her past history and from recent action, she would not be slow to consent to enter into negotiations to establish international bimetallism.

From the London Bullionist of February 6 we learn that an official decree had been promulgated appointing a permanent commission to consider the monetary question in France and other countries. I can say on excellent authority that there is not a prominent man in Holland who is not an international bimetallist. The chief powers comprising the Latin Union are France, Belgium, Switzerland, and Italy.

Concerning France I have already spoken. Of the remaining states I can say without hesitation that international bimetallism through guarantee of treaty will be to them the solution of a serious problem.

Turning to England, we find that the friends of the double standard are waging a hand-to-hand fight with the advocates of the gold standard, and that latterly the conflict has become very sharp. On January 22 the annual meeting of the "International Monetary Standard Association" was held in London. Henry H. Gibbs, ex-governor of the Bank of England, presided, and among other things said, that "he believed that the royal commission (of which he is a member) on the depressed condition of trade in Great Britain would report that the present condition of the silver question had an important bearing on the depression."

The meeting before adjourning resolved to form a gold and silver league on a popular basis. At Manchester, on the evening of February 16, a large and important silver meeting was held, including many members of Parliament and prominent silver advocates. Mr. Grenfell, ex-governor of the Bank of England, a prominent bimetallist, denounced the government for refusing to answer questions connected directly with the currency, and declared that the people had a right to the information for which those questions called.

On the 23d of February a meeting of the chambers of commerce of Great Britain was held at London.

The meeting, by a vote nearly unanimous—

Resolved, That the depreciation of silver and its present tendency to disuse as money are disturbing trade generally, and England's Eastern commerce in particular.

Another resolution adopted contained the following language:

We urge the Government to unite with other countries in an endeavor to restore silver to its former function as a legal tender, thereby giving it a permanent instead of a fluctuating value.

Mr. Morton Frewen, in a letter to the Pall Mall Gazette, in September, said:

There is no question of the day of the same importance to England as is the question of the future of silver. We in England require to know betimes what action Congress will take on this issue. A fall of 12 pence in the price of the ounce of silver has contracted the imperial revenue of India to the extent of some £6,000,000 sterling, and, far worse than even this, has absolutely dislocated our commercial relations with all those nations which use silver.

He further shows that the suspension of the coinage by the United States of the two million or more standard dollars per month would put England and her Indian empire in a position of extreme and, from our point of view, well-deserved difficulty. Mr. H. Schmidt, in a paper entitled "The future of silver," read before the institute of bankers in London on March 18, 1885, admitted that the proposed suspension of the Bland act was chiefly directed at England, but not so much directly as indirectly, through India, and that the immediate result would be disastrous. While I have no doubt that we could force Great Britain into a very awkward position, and while the minority party which favors the remonetization of silver is very active and aggressive, yet her people as a whole are extremely conservative, and the effort might prove unsuccessful.

International bimetallism can be accomplished, however, without England, for it existed without her from 1816, when she demonetized silver, until 1871. It was then that Germany began her attack upon silver in endeavoring to follow the example of England and became a gold single-standard country.

This brief review of the state of opinion in Europe shows that the scheme of getting the nations to agree upon the measure of mutual benefit which the United States proposed to them in 1878, and again in 1881, is a practical one, based upon the enlightened self-interest of the various nations whose agreement is sought. It shows that the obstacle to success is the indifference, the dullness and ignorance, of men in power in those governments; and, further, it shows the practical difficulty of getting nations to move.

Every member of this House realizes the difficulties of getting laws enacted or of getting the Departments or the executive head of the Government to do something new, something out of the ordinary course, and particularly if that something implies that there has been a blunder which will be shown by a change in the plan of action. You gentlemen should be the first to recognize the practical difficulty of which I speak. You know that nations move slowly, following in the rear of an enlightened public sentiment. You, of all others, ought to be able to see that what these high officials need in order to get them to move faster is to be shaken up. They need to be brought face to face with their responsibilities in the eyes of all the world, and the opportunity ought not to be afforded of seeking refuge behind a pretext of any character, no matter how adroit it may apparently be.

Now, gentlemen, the measure which I advocate will accomplish this result in every nation in Europe. A date fixed by us for suspension of the coinage of the standard dollar, unless there shall be international concurrence before this specified time, is a summons left in the hands of every European statesman who has any responsibility to his country, to his sovereign, or to his constituents; a summons which he can not forget or ignore, to wake up and take hold of this question in order to bring about its settlement upon the only basis which can possibly be permanent and satisfactory, the basis of international bimetallism through treaty agreement to open mints to the free coinage of silver at an established ratio to gold.

The honorable member from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] in his remarks upon this floor quoted Pliny as saying that "Gold was a curse." In Article X, on "National problems," he also quotes from the same writer and uses the following language:

Pliny speaks of the introduction of the gold denarius as a "crime committed against the welfare of mankind." If the introduction of gold coins into the Roman republic was for the purpose of increasing the money standard, then the denunciation of Pliny was not unmerited.

Mr. Speaker, I take it that every member has heard of Pliny and has a wholesome respect for an ancient Roman who could so far triumph over the ravages of time as to transmit an anti "gold-bug" message to the Forty-ninth Congress in a land that was not heard of until fourteen hundred years after his death. I can imagine a "gold-bug" writhing under the application of Pliny, and I see the constituencies of silver rejoicing over the unexpected re-enforcement which they owe to the learning of the honorable gentleman from Ohio. It is, however, my painful duty to tell the honorable gentleman that "all that glitters is not gold." Information is great, but accuracy is greater.

I hold in my hand a copy of the works of the aforesaid Pliny, and I find him on page 111, volume 6, talking of silver ore as another folly of mankind.

The melancholy fact is that the gentleman did not read far enough. This great Roman whom he has seen fit to throw at our heads was not an anti-gold man or an anti-silver man; he was an anti-money man. He believed in barter; he objected to money, and his reasoning was excellent. He objected to men's spending time in digging after money when they ought to have been digging after chemicals and drugs. He was writing a book on natural history, and he was a medical enthusiast, and spared nothing in his praise of medical knowledge. His idea was that men should be searching for remedies to cure diseases rather than to be spending their time in making iron for swords, or mining silver and gold for luxury and pleasure.

But, gentlemen, I am not here to vindicate Pliny, or to pick flaws in the literary productions of the member from Ohio, but I stand before you to bear testimony to the fact that the entire argument of the advocates of the standard silver dollar rests upon flimsy foundations, and will not pass inspection, therefore it is bound to break down. The same inaccuracy which I find in this citation from Pliny goes through the entire argument of the extreme silver men.

Take, for example, the minority report on the bill (H. R. 5690) now before the House, signed by Mr. BLAND, Mr. LANHAM, and Mr. BYNUM. I find on page 10 a statement about the various countries of the world and their money. Here is a list of gold-standard countries—countries where this metal is the standard money, where any owner of gold bullion can take it to the mint and get it turned into money at par.

Next is a list of double-standard countries, where one would suppose that gold and silver were the standard, and where the owner of gold or silver bullion could get it coined into money at par. Among others the United States of America is down as being a double-standard country. How is this? Can any owner of silver bullion take it to our mints and get it coined at all, or, in fact could he go to any of the important countries in that list with his silver and get it coined into money at par? No, of course not; so here is a false statement, as I look at it. Can any one maintain that that statement is not meant to mislead? But where did that statement originate? It comes from the report of the silver commission of 1876, printed the following year, before the enactment of the Bland law in 1878, and when gold was the standard of value and sole full metallic money. The statement is misleading today; it was more misleading in 1877.

France is in the list as being a double-standard country; Belgium, Italy, Switzerland, the Latin Union, which stopped the coinage of silver on private account in 1874 and stopped it on government account in 1878. France a double-standard country, when it is ten years since she has coined silver! Holland has coined none since 1875. It is charitable to suppose that the men who prepared that statement in 1876 were asleep, and that they thought every one else was asleep. Such misrepresentation of facts as these are all made in one interest. The report of 1877 was made in that same interest. The very basis of the argument of this interest is full of fallacies.

Why, gentlemen, if this table gave a true picture of the monetary condition of the commercial nations we should not be arguing this question in this House at this time, for we should not have any "silver question" on our hands. The standard dollar would be worth a dollar and three cents, instead of eighty; in fact, it is a question whether the trade-dollars and the standard dollars would not go to the melting pot to be sold as bullion to be exported to the double-standard countries, where it could be converted into money at the ratio of 15½ to 1.

If the Latin Union and Holland were true double-standard countries, as the table represents—that is, if silver could be taken to their mints and coined into money at the ratio of 15½ to 1—we should practically be in the condition we were in before the war, a double-standard country, but with gold alone flowing to our mints for free coinage. You can see why it was worth while for the attorney of the silver interest to prepare such a table; it is misleading and calculated to deceive, whether intentionally or through error I leave to you to decide. Whoever places any reliance upon it gets a distorted view of the situation. It ignores the main facts that every one should know who has to deal with the silver question.

I appeal to my friends on the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, who signed the minority report, to expunge that table from said report. I suggest to those gentlemen who have published it in their speeches to add a postscript, or to follow them, as they have been sent out, with a circular letter to this effect: "Error corrected. Instead of double-standard countries, as published in my speech, please read countries which were once double-standard countries but which are no longer such as they coin only gold."

Then follows the list of countries; after which add, "These countries hold more silver than the United States holds of gold and silver together, and if Mr. BLAND'S bill should become a law these countries may be expected to send silver sufficient to buy up all of our gold and leave us with the silver standard. In any case, this measure would ruin the prospects of international bimetallism."

For ten years the agitators for immoderate coinage here have held out this prospect to the gold men of Europe, and so have helped to prevent the success of bimetallism. These agitators for immoderate coinage are the men who have done most to keep down the price of the products of the West and South. Here is something which my friends BLAND, LANHAM, MCCREARY, LAFFOON, and CLEMENTS, of the House, and Mr. JONES, of the Senate, should have pasted upon their speeches and reports. If they do not do it themselves some one must do it for them.

Gentlemen, this line of tactics is not confined to this House, but it has invaded the Senate, spreading itself upon eight columns of the RECORD; I allude to the memorial of an association which is called the National Bimetallic Coinage Association. The true object of this association is the immediate sale of silver through inducing the representatives of the West and South to sacrifice their real interests to the imagined interests of silver States. Senator JONES, of Nevada, introduced this memorial on March 11. We find in it the same erroneous statements.

I ask all candid men if I am not warranted in finding evidences of a conspiracy of silver men to deceive the people and to mislead their representatives in Congress. The silver commission of 1876 and 1877, the minority report of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures of this Congress, and the memorial just alluded to all pervert facts upon the silver question. What does it mean? It means a good many things, but among others, and an important one to the silver-mine owners, it means a market for their production. They want to sell their silver; they claim protection from the Government; in fact, it has occurred to me that it would be cheaper for the people if the Government did protect them by paying a subsidy to the mine-owners rather than to pursue the present unfortunate policy.

In my judgment the silver-mine owners have gone too far; they have overestimated themselves. If they had been more modest in their claims they would have realized more than they have done. It was their fortune to have their private interests tied fast to one of the great interests of mankind, and they were so elated that they began to think they could control the monetary interests of the country. The silver men are trying to run the silver question, and the most they have done is to do harm to the cause of silver. Alas, for silver, if it only had such friends as these!

Now, gentlemen, let us take another long look at the principal facts that concern the past, the present, and the future of silver. These facts are, that down to a few years ago a combination of the chief nations coined all the silver that was offered at the mints at a fixed ratio to gold, which combination was broken up in the manner I have explained. This Government started a movement to get the nations to combine on restoring silver. That work is now in progress. It is in the hands of its friends in Europe who are working their way toward success. They ask our help; they ask us not to weaken them by continuing our coinage at the ratio of 16 to 1.

And now comes the same old cry for free and unlimited silver coinage, which from the beginning has encouraged the gold men of Europe to hold firm in the position they have taken. Gentlemen, I appeal to the sober second thought of this House to stifle this cry, which is really, though its authors may not know it, treason to the true interests of the country.

Gentlemen, this country is for bimetallism; it is for the restoration of silver to its former rights side by side with gold, rights which it had and which were guaranteed by international concert, and which shall be given and guaranteed by international concert again. The country, I say, is for an international ratio. This country is not in favor of a local ratio.

Let me tell my colleague on the committee [Mr. BLAND] that we are neither red Indians nor Chinese; that this ratio of 16, or more correctly 15.988, on which the present dollar is coined is not a "totem" nor "medicine" nor a little "joss" to our people. What they want is to see silver as good as gold, and no local ratio can accomplish that result. The ratio of 16 to 1, and free coinage, means the silver standard. I congratulate the three members of the minority who signed the minority report that they have been frank in saying that they "see no harm in coming to a single silver standard."

Now, Mr. Speaker, this country does want the single silver standard. It will not have it. The only reason why they tolerate the existing coinage of silver is because they have not fully understood the question. Error has been spread abroad throughout the land, and the Government Printing Office is being further used for its dissemination. It is time to call a halt, and I appeal to all men who care for the best interests of the people to unite in an effort to suspend compulsory coinage and for the accomplishment of international bimetallism. [Great applause.]

[During the delivery of the foregoing remarks the hammer fell.

Mr. FINDLAY. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York be permitted to occupy fifteen minutes more time.

There was no objection.

Mr. JAMES then resumed and concluded his remarks as above.]

Mr. O'DONNELL. Mr. Speaker, during the brief period that I have been a member of this House I have heard many able speeches upon the subject of silver and gold, mainly upon the former, and I have concluded, friendly as I am to silver, that there can be no question as to the truth of the apothegm of the German poet, "speech is silver, silence is golden."

While we have devoted much valuable time and thought to silver and gold, which yields but $80,000,000 per year in this country, the product of gold in California being $13,600,000, and in the other States and Territories $17,200,000, making a total of $30,800,000, the production of its white companion in monetary transactions, silver, is $48,800,000, making as I said, less than $80,000,000, or to be more specific, both of the precious metals being but $79,600,000 in value, we find our people are paying out each year $158,417,808 for a necessity, and no general effort is made to cheapen this article. I allude to sugar.

HISTORY OF SUGAR.

Sugar has become one of the necessaries of life, and every year adds to the amount consumed by each individual in this country. This esculent, now so much in demand in every household in this land, is an adjunct of our civilization. Sugar is supposed to have been known to the ancient Jews, and we read of it in the East Indies 325 B. C.; therefore it has been known for twenty-two hundred and ten years. The Orientals were wont to employ the juice of the cane as a beverage, while in the second century it was prescribed as a medicine by Galen. Sugar was brought to Europe from Asia in 625, and it grew so popular that it was quite largely consumed in 1150. In 1497 the English began to favor it, and the demand and supply grew so great that it sold for 8*d.* per pound. Eighteen years after the discovery of America the Spaniards and Portuguese introduced it into this country, and here it has ever since been a favorite article of food. To go back only to 1850, in that year the people of this country consumed 538,932,000 pounds, while last year the consumption was 2,915,789,153 pounds, to say nothing of the 26,336,301 gallons of molasses. These figures indicate that the partiality for sugar among our people increased faster than did our population. To show the exact amount of sugar used in this country during the last fiscal year I would give the following official figures:

	Pounds.
Product of Louisiana, estimated from last year's crop	287,712,230
Imports	2,717,884,653
Total imports and production	3,005,596,883
Less exports, nearly all refined	258,163,890
Remaining for consumption	2,747,432,993

Now, allowing for wastage in refining, &c., and estimating the consumption at 2,700,000,000 pounds and the cost to the consumers at 5½ cents per pound, the value would be $148,500,000.

As you will see by the above table, the imports and production of cane and beet sugar during the last fiscal year were about 3,000,000,000 pounds. The cost of the imported sugar, including the duty paid and excluding freight and other charges, was about 5 cents per pound. The freight and other charges would bring its cost fully up to 5 cents per pound, and the value of the domestic product is greater per pound than the imported. Estimating the cost of the whole at 5 cents per pound as landed on our shores and at the plantations in Louisiana, the cost of the imports and product would be about $150,000,000. I have mentioned in this huge amount only the imported and domestic cane and beet sugar. To this should be added beet, sorghum, maple, and glucose sugar grown on our soil. The production of maple sugar in this country last year was 58,016,000 pounds; sugar from molasses, 105,860,160 pounds; beet and sorghum, 4,480,000 pounds. These last-mentioned sugar products amount to 168,356,160 pounds, worth about $8,417,808. Adding this to the imports and products of Louisiana would make the cost to our people to be $158,417,808 per year. Nor is this all. To these figures should be the addition of sirup and molasses, the amount of which last year was as follows:

	Gallons.	Value per gallon.	Value.
Imported molasses	34,128,640	$0 20	$6,889,909
Domestic molasses	14,653,608	35	5,128,763
Glucose molasses	28,000,000	28	7,840,000
Sorghum molasses	18,000,000	30	5,400,000
Maple molasses	1,796,048	60	1,077,629
Total	96,578,296		26,336,301

You add the above amount, $26,336,301 to the amount it costs us for sugar, $158,417,818, and you find the sugar bill, embraced in sugar, molasses, and sirup, of this country for one year to be $184,754,119, or $3.35 for each person in the United States. I should here state that the item domestic molasses was as follows: Produced in Louisiana, 11,761,608 gallons; in all other Southern States, 2,892,000 gallons.

Now let us look at the cost of flour to our people:

	Bushels.
The wheat crop is	512,763,900
Estimated allowance for seed	65,266,239
Leaving	447,497,661
Deduct amount exported	84,653,714
Remaining for consumption	362,843,947

The remainder, reduced to flour at 4½ bushels to the barrel, would give 80,631,988 barrels of flour. Of this the export was 10,648,145 barrels, leaving 69,983,843 for consumption, which, at $5.50 per barrel, would amount to $384,911,136.

It will be observed that while the consumption of flour costs us not quite $7 for each person, they pay out for sugar $3.35 for each inhabitant.

Our people are very fond of sugar, as only one nation shows a greater consumption, and that is England, the official tables showing the amount to be 68 pounds per capita among the Britons, while we consume 60 pounds for each person, which demonstrates the consumption is fast increasing here, as in 1867 it was 29 pounds per capita and in 1884 it averaged 54 pounds, showing in seventeen years more than doubled consumption per capita, the figures this year being 60 pounds for each person residing under our flag. Other peoples are not given to consuming the product as much as ours, as the quantity consumed in Scandinavia is 22 pounds per capita, 21 pounds in France, the same in Germany, 16 pounds each in Belgium and Holland, 14 pounds in Austria, 7 pounds in Russia and Italy, while in Spain and Portugal 5 pounds suffice for each inhabitant.

TAXATION ON SUGAR.

Sugar being an article of such general consumption has frequently been a source of revenue to nations. In 1685 a tax was levied by England under James II, and it was kept on but equalized in 1846, followed by a reduction in 1848. Then the Crimean war was the pretext for increasing it in 1855, not to be reduced until 1857; this tax was maintained by the English Government until 1874, though in the interim it was decreased frequently. To-day, in the United States, more than 25 per cent. of the duties collected come from sugar. Last year we imported 2,578,993,335 pounds of sugar, entered for consumption, paying an average rate of duty of 1.97 cents per pound, which was 89.13 cents per capita, amounting in the aggregate to $50,885,916. Added to this we imported 169,652,783 pounds of sugar from the Hawaiian Islands, which was free from duty. The consumption per capita was 48.14 pounds of the imported article. In addition we imported 32,278,468 gallons of molasses, paying a duty of 4 cents per gallon on 32,206,819 gallons, yielding a revenue of $1,289,224, or 2.26 cents per capita. Seventy-one thousand six hundred and forty-nine gallons came from the Sandwich Islands, having free entrance to this country. The consumption of imported molasses was 0.57 gallon for each person last year. You will see the revenue collected by this Government last year from sugar and molasses amounted to $52,175,140—a large sum for sweetening life, or 91.39 cents import tax for each man, woman, and child in the country.

Mr. Speaker, in pondering over these facts and figures and realizing that this was the greatest manufacturing nation in the world, I marveled that the United States of America could not produce its own sugar and molasses. Investigation has proven to my mind that the land is capable of supplying our people with all the sugar they can consume. We have the soils and climate essential to grow this staple article. Knowing this, I thought the time had come to render this nation wholly independent of others for our sugar supply. Believing thus, on the 5th day of January, 1886, I offered the following bill, which I send to the clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill to repeal the duty on sugar and provide for the payment of a bounty for the cultivation of sugar in the United States of America.

Be it enacted, &c., That from and after the 1st day of July, A. D. 1886, all duties now levied on the importation of sugar into the United States of America be, and the same are hereby, repealed: Provided, That no sugar shall be permitted to be imported from any country whose government imposes an export duty thereon.

SEC. 2. That there shall be paid from the Treasury of the United States of America the sum of 1 cent per pound as a bounty to all persons, corporations, companies, or societies cultivating sugar within the boundaries of the said United States of America, be the same produced from cane, beets, or sorghum; the said bounty hereby authorized to be paid for each pound of refined sugar cultivated in the United States of America and sold in the markets of this or any other country, the payment of said bounty herein provided to be made under such rules and regulations as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury and Commissioner of Agriculture, acting jointly, to provide methods for carrying out the provisions of this act; and the sum of $8,000,000 is hereby appropriated for such purpose from any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That the bounty herein authorized shall be expended for sugar grown during the years 1886 and 1887 in said United States of America.

Mr. O'DONNELL. This bill, Mr. Speaker, on the day that it saw the light was read twice, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed. It was printed, and then went to the cemetery of the committee, where it has enjoyed a sweet sleep ever since, undisturbed until summoned from its resting-place to-day. It is a gratification to have its provisions read to this House, and I trust its reading has been pleasant to you. The Committee on Ways and Means are a disappointment to me; so far as this measure is concerned it has found only ways that are dark and means that are not favorable to cheap sugar for the country. I say to them, "How sweet a plant have you untimely cropped."

As I look over this bill, I find it defective in many ways. The amount in bounties sought to be given is too small, and its provisions do not extend into enough years. I wish some gentleman would move an amendment to make the bounty 2 or 3 cents per pound for raw sugar, and extend the benefits for a period of five or even ten years, in order to encourage capitalists to make investments, thereby giving them confidence of a practical protection, which would lead to establishments of large magnitude. In a few years they would be independent of the sugar growers of the world, thereby giving us the great desideratum, sugar at low prices, grown on American soil.

My object in introducing the bill, Mr. Speaker, was to carry out, if possible, the recommendations of the President of the United States. You will remember in his first message to this Congress he alluded to the reduction of taxation. In that document he made the following observation:

The reduction should be made in the revenue derived from a tax upon the imported necessaries of life. We thus directly lessen the cost of living in every family of the land, and release to the people in every humble home a larger measure of the rewards of frugal industry.

What measure could be devised for this purpose better than the one I have brought to your attention? You will, if you pass this bill with the amendment I have suggested, take off the tax on this important necessary of life, and thus directly lessen the cost of living in every family in the land and at the same time give many of them employment. Many members complain because the President did not more specifically point out the way to diminish taxation. Perhaps the Executive had in his mind the idea that some member of this House would offer such a bill as I have had the honor of presenting and he felt delicate in mentioning the matter before the bill aforesaid saw the light. I sincerely hope this is the state of the case. I want to tell you, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, that this is not a question of tariff or free trade; it is, pure and simple, a question of affording sugar cheap to the people and providing labor to the unemployed. This is the whole question summarized. On this there can be no sectional feeling; it is a peaceful conquest over difficulties, and it is time, for "a nation can not always feed on the strong meat of great controversies."

Therefore, having shown the crying need of some practical effort to give our citizens sugar at a lower price, as one of the means at hand I desire to call attention to

BEET SUGAR.

I will speak as briefly as I can of the cultivation of beet sugar and the enormous product thereof. The antiquity of the sugar-bearing beet is attested by Theophrastus, the Greek moralist and naturalist, the pupil of Plato and Aristotle, who lived until A. D. 287, who described the saccharine qualities of the plant. In 1590 it is mentioned by De Serres, and we have accounts of its appearance in England in 1548, while in 1782 it was largely used in France for food for man and animals. The root is believed to have had its origin in Germany, on which nation it has conferred wealth and prosperity. It was utilized as food until 1747, when Margraff, a scientist dwelling in Berlin, by patient experiments learned of the great wealth of sugar existing in the humble plant. But, like nearly all friends of the race and devotees of science, he died without seeing his discovery become the great benefactor of mankind he had hoped, and for which he had toiled and given the best years of his life. Half a century after, a pupil, Achard, likewise a scientist, remembered the researches of his tutor, and applied himself to the task until in 1797 he presented to the Academy of Science of France specimens of sugar from the beet, and made the declaration that the article could be produced for what in our money would be 6 cents per pound. Ridicule, doubt, and contumely followed the utterances of the savant, and the labor of years provoked a storm of derision. Yielding to the solicitation of Achard, the French scientists at last hearkened to him, and after patient investigation made the declaration that sugar might be secured from the beet, but in their judgment it could never supplant the cane sugar. The subject was shortly after abandoned in France, the decision of the scientists causing the beet soon to pass out of men's minds.

Not so in Germany. The Teutonic men of science gave to the discovery the attention which it merited, and in a few years practical experiments were made at Freyburg, Cunern, Athaldsleben, and Strehlen, in Lower Silesia. By the aid of perfected methods good sugar was made, although the cost was very large for each pound. This was the beginning of a great industry in Europe, which has proven of much advantage to the people thereof. As the methods were made more perfect for securing the product, in 1809, when Napoleon had issued his decrees of Berlin and Milan, establishing the continental blockade, whereby the yield of England's colonies was prohibited admission, the new sugar enterprise enjoyed what we term in this country a "boom," and in consequence the sugar of the beet of necessity became an article of commerce. Germany was not unmindful of the triumphs of science, and extended substantial encouragement, which resulted in the multiplication of factories and much attention being given to the growth of the plant. The King of Prussia was generous with the sweet infant industry, and gifts of money and schools of instruction to educate the people in approved methods of culture were the evidences of the royal appreciation. The royal regency of Silesia attested its satisfaction at the schools established by Government bounty. In Germany the industry had fairly become established when devastating war swept away the labor of years. As peace came the revival of the project was quite slow. In 1836 the business was again inaugurated, and all over that nation the factories sprang up, growing rapidly and multiplying, receiving assistance from the government, until the beet sugar, though yet aided by bounties, now contributes to support the government whose fostering hand gave it life and strength. Every year, from the beginning until now, the government lent its aid to the project, thereby adding to the stability and magnitude of the product. The result is that last year Germany placed upon the market 1,150,000 tons of this sugar.

I have hastily sketched the origin and great success of sugar cultivation in Germany. Now we turn to France. The French, observing the outcome of the venture in Germany, gave consideration to the matter. Napoleon, great warrior and far-seeing statesman as he was, saw the inestimable advantages of the discovery, and sought to promote thereby the good of his people and interests of the nation's commerce. He issued an imperial decree, and in that document gave utterance to a sentiment which should be the motto of our people, "Let manufacturing establishments multiply everywhere." Then he adopted the means for direct encouragement of the beet-sugar industry by the establishment of experimental farms and schools, to be presided over by competent chemists, where students, land proprietors, and farmers should be instructed in the knowledge essential to the cultivation of the beet and the methods of extracting the sugar therefrom. For that purpose, burdened as his empire was with debt and war, he appropriated one million francs ($200,000), to be paid from the budget of 1811, and then prohibited after a certain day the importation of the sugar of the Indies as being of English manufacture and commerce. Societies in France also offered handsome premiums. As a result, in that year nearly 17,000 acres of sugar-beets were sown in the different portions of France, yielding almost 99,000 tons of roots. As this crop was ready for gathering, forty factories were prepared to handle it. It was estimated the yield would be more than three million pounds of sugar, but the crop was not all worked. When the emperor had reckoned the supply of sugar from his venture and the expenditure for working the same, he discovered that each pound produced had cost about 45 cents. But he had faith in the purpose and his will asserted itself. In 1812 he established special schools for the manufacture of beet-root sugar, issued five hundred licenses to manufacturers, and encouraged them by immunity from taxation for the period of four years. That season the wise emperor saw impossibilities disappear before his efforts, and he found three hundred and thirty-four factories running and the cost of production reduced to 15 cents per pound to the manufacturers. The high prices had decreased the consumption, and it was estimated the 7,000,000 pounds produced would supply half the needs of the people of the empire.

Prior to the establishment of the beet-sugar industry France imported 52,000,000 pounds of sugar annually, which fell to less than 11,000,000 each year after the beet-sugar was grown on French soil. Napoleon pursued his way, and by the beet-sugar product dealt his enemy, the Englishman, a terrible blow, and "the injurious consequences produced in that country from an interruption of their commerce with the continent," to use his words, afforded the ruler of the French much comfort. He boldly announced the French would be enabled to do without the sugars of the Indies, which conclusion gave him great satisfaction, as he concluded it would seriously impair the resources of the English. The Britons were alarmed at the industry so ardently fostered by the Emperor of the French. Louis Napoleon states that the English sought to break down the growing "infant industry" by offering Achard $100,000 "if he would publish a work declaring that he had been carried away by his enthusiasm," and that the results were not such as he had expected. Failing in securing the aid of the savant, it is related the English induced an eminent scientist of their country to issue a volume demonstrating the worthlessness of the sugar made from beets. These acts had no effect on Napoleon, who adhered to his policy of subsidizing, and though badly crippled by maintaining armies and navies, he still lent assistance to this division of the products of France. At the downfall of Napoleon this measure of his wisdom was fiercely attacked by the Bourbons and it fell into decay. Amid the general wreck of war and onslaught on the industry by the French rulers one factory survived at Arras, in 1815, and from the devastation and losses by conflict the business took a new start, and year by year slowly progressed, helped by the government all the time, until to-day the manufacture of indigenous sugar is a source of wealth to France and happiness to its people. A heavy duty for years helped the growth of the enterprise. Although the bounty still rewards the producer, the great supply is a source of revenue to the French Government.

Russia was not an indifferent observer of the trials of Germany and France to produce their own sugar, and the Emperor of all the Russias saw at once the feasibility of the plans of his neighbors and was not slow in extending aid in a liberal manner to those who would successfully cultivate beet sugar on Russian soil. In 1813 the ruler issued a ukase that all lands of his subjects on which sugar factories were established should be exempt from taxation, and in those days that constituted a generous bounty. Furthermore, he gave the proprietor of the first factory a present of $39,000 as an encouraging reward for his enterprise. Before the possibilities of success were fairly developed in Russia the war paralyzed the projected sugar operations, but with the return of peace the ruler of the Muscovites sought to supply his people with sugar grown on Russian soil, and the bounty is yet paid to bring about sugar production, with large success attending the effort.

Mr. Speaker, I have hastily sketched the development of beet sugar growth in Germany, France, and Russia. I have no time to speak of the methods employed to secure the same end by Austria, Belgium, and Holland. I have shown the marvelous development of this branch of sugar-production by government aid in bounties. As a consequence there is now more beet sugar produced than there is of cane, as you will see by the following exhibit, which is authentic.

Mauritius	128,000

The table I have given shows that the beet-sugar product of the world exceeds that of cane sugar by 446,250 tons per annum. And yet, I repeat, it is an infant industry, whose growth is stimulated by nations by liberal bounties. Germany, France, Austria, Russia, Belgium, and Holland encouraged the cultivation of beet sugar, and the result is those countries produced last year 5,052,500,000 pounds of sugar, and they are so well satisfied with the result of their investment in bounties that they maintain them yet, giving their own people the article at low prices and affording it at cheap rates to the inhabitants of other nations.

The inquiry is made, can beet sugar be produced in the United States? Of this there can be but little doubt. The climatic conditions are such that New England, New York, Michigan, portions of Wisconsin, Minnesota, Dakota, Pennsylvania, and Ohio are suited for beet culture. California last year produced 2,500,000 pounds. It is evident in those States named the sugar-yielding beet will thrive, and with the knowledge of the methods of culture now obtainable failure is not to be thought of, and this country can, if it will, bestow a saccharíferous blessing upon mankind. If the sugar beet will flourish on the steppes of Russia, as it certainly does, it will in this land. In Maine, in two years (1879 and 1880) sugar and sirup from beets were made to the value of $200,000, and I have no doubt if the assistance had been extended that should have been, the people of Maine would now be in the enjoyment of sugar grown in their own State.

Production of sugar is not the only profit from the growing of the beet. The pulp is admirably adapted for feeding sheep and cattle, and these animals fatten wonderfully fast on the residue from the sugar-mill. The growth of the beet enriches the land, and prepares it for cereals in such manner that the yield is increased. It affords an excellent soil food. In 1853, Louis Napoleon, after much study and observation, declared that where the beet is grown the selling value of the land considerably increased, the wages of workmen have followed the same ascending progression, and the general welfare has improved in a wonderful manner. This epitomizes what we need in this country. In those sections where beet culture has become firmly established the value of land has greatly enhanced. It cheapens sugar, affords employment, enriches land, increases its value, is profitable to the cultivator, and aids progress and prosperity.

SUGAR FROM SORGHUM.

There is another sugar-cane which will flourish in most every portion of the United States of America. This is the saccharum, known as sorghum. The people of this country have had practical knowledge of this cane for over a third of a century, when it was introduced into this land from China and flourished moderately for many years. It is closely allied to the sugar-cane, and when cultivated with that knowledge now so generally understood will yield large returns. It has been known in Asiatic countries for thousands of years, and is one of the greatest benefactors of mankind. A large portion of the inhabitants of the East Indies and Turkestan subsist on this cereal, as it with them occupies the place of maize, and man and beast live upon it—the people upon the seed, while the stalks and blade afford forage. Good authority assures us that for thousands of years the seed of sorghum has furnished food in greater abundance for both humanity and animals than has wheat and corn combined. As to its merits for sugar-producing there is no doubt. In the county where I live I have seen first-rate sugar from this cane, and it was produced by necessarily crude methods. In Japan it is officially announced that half the supply of sugar for the Japanese was grown from sorghum. It appears the children of the moon are further advanced in sugar-culture than are the progressive Americans. They produce 65,000,000 pounds of this sugar each year. In China they produce 1,000,000 tons, the larger part being from sorghum, enabling them to export 55,000 tons. Their methods of sugar-production are very primitive, too. Even in New Jersey, in the last four years, 1,259,535 pounds of sugar from sorghum have been produced, not to mention the great amount of sirup from the same State.

Sorghum, though known through the ages, has not yet taken the place it should occupy with us. It is adapted to all soils and climates, and, if given half a chance, will thrive anywhere. It is like unto a goodly portion of mankind—susceptible of improvement, and will develop along with our civilization. It will grow where corn will, and is a close connection of the maize, though possessing far larger saccharine qualities. It is a hardy, vigorous cereal, and is the step-child of science; it will yet solve one of the greatest of the economic problems in the economical world. It took a vigorous start in Europe at one time, but the beet terminated its existence, and sorghum was relegated to the lowly ranks of fodder and fire-wood. But the world knows its sugar-secretion products, and will yet give it the position in our resources it merits. Its content of sugar is so great, that it deserves a nation's bounty to encourage the development of which it is capable. It will yet be accorded its place in industrial science. Its cultivation in this country as a sugar product was abandoned, as I believe, owing to the imperfect methods in use for the extraction of the juice. The patient hand of science has obviated this difficulty, as I will presently endeavor to show. The cultivation of sorghum increases the fertility of the soil and is a general benefit.

For more than a century our people have endeavored to find sugar in some product indigenous to our soil. Abigail Adams tells us, in a letter to John Adams in 1777, of the efforts made, and with considerable success, to obtain molasses and sugar from corn and the attention devoted to the practical experiments. But these became obsolete, and the early fathers wearied of their plans, the enthusiasm dying out, and with the close of the Revolutionary war they abandoned the means intended to substitute the sugar of the West Indies. Their efforts were to secure sugar from corn. This plan is yet thought of, and we have glucose. I do not know the amount of sugar and molasses secured each year, but it is considerable, as there are twenty factories, in seven States, with $10,000,000 capital, requiring 61,000 bushels of corn each day, giving employment to nearly five thousand workmen, paying $2,058,750 in wages, consuming $13,703,000 worth of material, the total product being valued at $18,270,000 per annum, and they make money. It is time for this generation to take up the matter of sugar.

I have shown what other peoples have done with the sugar beet. Sorghum is easier to grow, and it contains crystallizable sugar in such measure as will yield profit to those who raise it. The imperfect experience heretofore had demonstrates that this country can supply all its people with sugar from sorghum alone and also export in quantity. I am aware there have been frequent failures, not so disastrous, however, as attended the beet when first tried. Correct cultivation will bring success. Intelligent tillage and improved appliances for extracting the sugar will demonstrate the immense value of sorgho, and add a new factor to the agricultural products of America. We know that excellent sugar has been made from sorghum; that fact can be demonstrated in this capital. If that can be done here, it certainly can be in other portions of this country. The plastic nature of this plant, adapting itself to climatic conditions, and yielding saccharine juices which can be crystallized into sugar, point the wisdom of promoting its cultivation. We know analysis has shown and experience confirmed that sorghum is very rich in those constituents that readily crystallize into sugar. I have said it will flourish in most any portion of the country; trial will yet demonstrate the meteorological conditions requisite for its successful propagation.

I look to sorghum as affording one of the true economic solutions of a great and pressing problem. In 1884 it is estimated that 1,000,000 pounds of sugar were produced from this cane, notwithstanding the crudeness and inefficiency of the machinery employed. Scientific research is placing sorghum in the catalogue where it belongs. When this plant has had the attention that has been given to the beet it will stand higher in the estimation of the sugar producers, and the obstacles to securing its product will be removed. It is conceded by scientists who have studied the question closely that when the knowledge of climate and soil has located those areas where it will thrive best, that "5,000,000 acres of land will produce all the sugar required for this country for several years to come." I have dwelt at some length upon the sugar-producing qualities of sorghum. It has other merits. It will not only make good sugar and a corresponding quality of sirup, but affords excellent cakes, superior to the buckwheat. It will give us the cake and furnish the sirup from the same—a commendable combination. Its seed is equal to corn for raising stock, the bagasse makes good firewood, the skimming furnishes pure vinegar, the pressed stalk makes a good wrapping paper, while other portions are the best of fertilizers. What more can be asked of any plant?

BOUNTIES.

I am aware, Mr. Speaker, of the prejudice existing in this country to subsidies for any class. The feeling is not without reason. But in this matter the proposed bounties will prove a benefit to all the people—to capital and labor alike. You will remember that Alexander Hamilton, confessedly one of the ablest men of his time, the great friend of the industrial growth of his country, proposed bounties for the production of sugar. (See communication to the House of Representatives, December 5, 1791.) This great financier thought sugar production merited national encouragement. He was of opinion that the difficulties in bestowing bounties were not sufficiently great to countervail the advantages of which they were productive, and that they were in some cases indispensable. The case under consideration is one of these. New Jersey looked with favor on the effort to grow sugar on its own soil, and passed an act to encourage the manufacture of sugar in that State. The result is a large sugar factory is in operation at Rio Janeiro (New Jersey), near Cape May, where in the last four years

1,259,535 pounds of sugar from sorghum has been produced. The State paid a bounty of $12,594.85 for this sugar, and on 31,128 tons of cane additional bounties to the amount of $31,128.

Germany to-day pays a bounty of 4.80 marks per 100 kilograms of beet sugar, or in our money $1.16 for each 220 pounds. France does more than its neighbor, giving 9.15 francs for each 100 kilograms, equivalent to $1.80 for 220 pounds. Russia gives a bounty of 1½ cents per pound. The people of this country will wonder why they are not cared for as well as those of the Old World. If you provide bounties which will result in giving our inhabitants cheap sugar, grown on American soil, you will place the Forty-ninth Congress as among the wisest, most profound, mankind-loving, and humanity-benefiting of any bodies with legislative functions that ever assembled. Ah! gentlemen, see the place you may, if you will, occupy in the annals of your country and in the estimation of the world if you encourage the industry I am speaking to you about. In the parliament of man this Congress will be embalmed in the hearts of coming generations—if it helps along the effort to give the people good sugar at low prices. Remember this bounty will go to a class of our citizens who are rarely recognized or remembered, the farming community—the class who confer great benefits but rarely receive them. If the United States should dispose of a few millions of dollars from its bursting vaults of idle wealth to establish a great industry which could only benefit the entire people, it will, in my judgment, be an act of wisdom—ay, of sound statesmanship. Surely we should profit by the prescience of the rulers of the Old World, who realized the good they could confer on their countrymen by the establishment of an industry which has brought bountiful blessings not only on their people, but neighboring nations. Let us gather wisdom from them and in this matter follow in their footsteps.

On this question of bounties let us look at home. In the grand and prosperous State of Michigan, which Commonwealth I have the honor in part to represent on this floor, its Legislature wisely encouraged the production of salt. In 1840, while the State was sparsely populated, $5,000 was appropriated to help the development, and up to 1842 over $20,000 had been expended, and that year $15,000 more were appropriated. The experiments were not as successful as hoped for. In 1859 all property on which salt was produced was exempted from taxation and 10 cents bounty for each bushel of salt was authorized. The consequence was the salt product was increased from 4,000 barrels to 125,000 per year. Then the Legislature fixed the bounty at 10 cents per barrel, exempting the lands, blocks, machinery, and product from taxation. The production nearly doubled the next year, and 243,000 barrels were thrown on the market, to be again doubled in the following year. The good work went on, until now over 3,000,000 barrels of Michigan salt are offered for sale each year at wonderfully low prices. The Michigan legislator who proposed this wise measure to build up he salt industry of the Peninsular State encountered much opposition t to his measure, as the good people of Michigan were then prejudiced against bounties. But the father of the law stood by and secured its enactment, and now has the satisfaction of seeing the wisdom of his views more than vindicated, and beholds his State manufacturing nearly half of the salt now consumed in the United States. The bounty in all did not, it is calculated, equal the cost of the hoops alone upon the packages of salt shipped from the State last year. Good authority states the progress of salt manufacture in Michigan during the four years of bounties was greater than in the Kanawha Valley in fifty years, and the development of this industry in Michigan in five years was larger than at the Onondaga salt springs in forty-two years. Michigan now leads any other section in the magnitude of its saline product. You will see Michigan men have reason to think well of the excellent influence of bounties in building up an industry which supplies a necessity at very low prices.

HOW OUR CITIZENS PAY TRIBUTE TO OTHER COUNTRIES.

By our present system of sugar supply we not only pay a duty to our own Government on our imported sugar, but we pay an export duty to other countries. We get sugar free of duty from the Sandwich Islands, but that is of no advantage to our people, as it simply builds up a monopoly on the Pacific coast, and while we lose the revenue we do not cheapen sugar. As to the export duties, Cuba, Porto Rico, Brazil, the British West Indies, and other governments—twelve in all—levy a tax on every pound of sugar or gallon of molasses sent from their shores, and our people pay the same. It is the unwritten law of this nation that we pay no tribute to any foreign kingdom or principality, and yet we are every year contributing to sustain the governments of the sugar-producing nations. It was once the shibboleth of a great party, "Millions for defense, but not one cent for tribute." We have changed all that; we have adopted its antithesis; we do not give a cent for defense, but we pay millions for tribute. We support the laborers of other lands and pay a round sum to maintain their governments, and all this to secure an article of food we must have. Is this statesmanship? It is utterly repugnant to our system of national government. You may discuss tariff and free trade and gold and silver as you will to the end of the session, but here is a great wrong on our people, our Government, and our institutions utterly unheeded, forgotten, overlooked, and not realized, while it is grinding us all. Good judges hold that 75 per cent. of our importations of sugar come from export-taxing countries, so that we are every year paying enormous sums of money (gold, too) to keep the machinery of the governments of other countries running. You will see by the table I append of the export-taxing countries that we are paying a tribute to foreign nations in the shape of export duties on sugar to the amount of $3,301,561.57 each year.

This valuable table comes from the Bureau of Statistics of the Treasury Department, an admirably conducted bureau, I am pleased to say.

This is not a sweet morsel to masticate and ruminate over. I am gratified, sir, that bill 1226 (the measure I have alluded to, and which I had the honor of introducing, as I have already told you) proposed to prohibit importations from the countries whose laws exacted this tribute. I was rejoiced to observe that the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, a gentleman whom I esteem, when he offered his tariff-reducing bill, took notice of that portion of bill 1226, and incorporated a segment of the many good things therein. I wish he had embodied other propositions contained in that bill. I am obliged to the gentleman for the portion he did condescend to accept, while sorrowing over the omission to embrace the many other desirable features intended to promote the happiness of our people.

IN AID OF LABOR.

The passage of a bill like the one I have outlined will help solve the labor problem. Napoleon declared his sugar establishments gave employment to laborers who would otherwise be idle; that they organized and elevated labor. As we look over the land and behold those living in enforced idleness it is apparent something to bring about the ideas of Napoleon is speedily needed here. Disguise it as we may, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, the legislative department of the Government must eventually settle this problem which has vexed the ages. Those who would gladly labor but seek in vain for occupation are looking to this Congress to devise means that shall lead to employment for the idle. They know they willingly aid the Government when it is in distress, and they have a right to believe the legislative department of their Government will project enactments to relieve them from the lamentable effects of the paralysis of trade which has stricken our nation. They do not want the Government to care for them, but they demand that their representatives in this free Republic shall at least take the same interest in the welfare of its citizens as the monarchies of the Old World exhibit for their subjects. To supply our people with home-grown sugar would give employment to many thousands who are now idle, but anxious to labor. Why, ten years ago France gave employment to seventy thousand persons in its sugar industries—the number is greater now—and Germany and the other beet-sugar countries have many thousands engaged in this occupation in its various channels. In the small output in California $150,000 per year is expended among workmen and farmers for labor and material. By supplying our own sugar it would not only be afforded cheaper to the poor man as well as the rich, but open an avenue leading to steady occupation summer and winter. By such law as I suggest you commence to allay the uneasy and dissatisfied feeling among those who toil and bring to them profitable employment and general content—a duty every government owes to its citizens. This will be the commencement of prosperity, the harbinger of the good times we all wish and hope for. They only ask you to plant the flower of prosperity; "the dew by which such blossoms are nourished is called the sweat of man's brow."

AMERICAN SCIENCE AIDS THE EFFORTS FOR CHEAP SUGAR.

Heretofore the effort to cultivate sugar in this country from sorghum and beets has been rendered almost nugatory by our imperfect methods for its extraction. This disadvantage is rapidly passing away, for American ingenuity and science have discovered means whereby 98 per cent. of all the sugar contained in sorghum, cane, or beets is speedily, easily, and thoroughly extracted and manufactured into an article which is merchantable. And the methods now employed leave no waste, but turn everything into value. Late experiments in Spain and in our own country prove that the system of diffusion and carbonatation will enable us to produce sugar at a low price and at the same time give us a good article. Step by step the sugar growers of this land are enabled to overcome every difficulty, and the late practical demonstration of the utility of the processes insures cheap sugar for Americans, grown on American soil, cultivated and manufactured by the workingmen and machinery of America. Now all that remains to bring about this great benefit and aid to progress is to pass the bill 1226, with the amendments I have suggested.

WHAT WE SHOULD DO.

Mr. Speaker, I have occupied a great deal of time on this question, which I regard as vital to the welfare of this country and its inhabitants. I trust the Forty-ninth Congress will give this subject that consideration it so well deserves, thereby initiating a measure to assist our people to produce an article that is indispensable to them and their comfort. In doing this you will not cripple the sugar-growers of the South, but, on the contrary, help them. Let us cease paying tribute to other governments; let us stop giving employment to laborers of other nations, and instead afford work for our own people; let us wipe out the taxes we collect on this esculent, and thereby lighten the burden on every dweller on our soil. As has been eloquently remarked in this Chamber, the God of nature has formed this land for man's enjoyment, and let man carry out the design of a wise Providence. Pass this bill 1226, enlarging its provisions, and you relieve distress, you promote prosperity, you augment industry, you bestow with bounteous hand the element of progress, giving employment to the unemployed, developing the nation's wealth and resources, benefiting alike the humble and the wealthy, adding to the comfort of every resident, helping the poor, in fact "making the hard way sweet."

Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of more generally informing the people on the nature of the processes of diffusion and carbonatation mentioned above, I desire to add a full description of each as obtained from the chemist of the Agricultural Department, a department not recognized to the extent it eminently deserves, and for this purpose append the same to my remarks.

The processes of diffusion and carbonatation.

DIFFUSION.

The process of diffusion is based upon the physical phenomenon known as osmose. When crystallizable and amorphous bodies are in solution and separated by a thin membrane from pure water or a less dense solution of the same substances, it is found that the crystalloid body passes rapidly through the membrane until the two liquids are practically equally saturated by it. The colloid body, on the other hand, tends to form an equilibrium much more slowly—so much so, indeed, that by the time the crystalloid has distributed itself evenly in the two liquids the colloid is still nearly all in the original solution. By a repetition of this process it is possible to effect an almost complete separation of the two bodies. In a sugar-producing plant the cell walls, within which the sugar is contained, are the membranes through which this osmose goes on. By bringing the finely sliced substance of such a plant into contact with successive portions of warm water almost every trace of the sugar passes out and the water passes in to take its place. It is thus seen that diffusion is quite different from maceration. In the latter process the material from which the extraction is to be made is first reduced to a pulp and the cell walls ruptured. The extraction is just as perfect in maceration as in diffusion, but soluble crystalloids and colloids are alike removed.

In practice the process of diffusion may be briefly described as follows: The cane is cut into thin slices not more than one-quarter inch in thickness. These chips are now carried to vessels called cells connected together with a rather complicated system of pipes and valves and together forming the "battery." Three of the cells are first filled with warm water. As the liquid passes from one cell to another it goes through a system of copper pipes surrounded with steam. This apparatus is called a "calorisator." By it the liquid can be raised to any required temperature. The cell having been filled with chips, the warm water is admitted. In the best arranged batteries, it enters from the bottom of the cell. As soon as the second cell is filled with the chips, the warm water is turned into the first cell entering from the top. This fresh water forces out the liquid in the first cell, which is already partially saturated with sugar, through the calorisator and into the second cell, entering again from the bottom. When the third cell is full of chips the fresh water is again turned into the top of the first cell, forcing its contents into the second but entering at the top of the second—and driving in turn the contents of the latter, still further saturated with sugar, into the third. This process goes on, the liquid entering every cell, except the one containing the fresh chips, from the top, until all the cells of the battery but two are brought into play. As is seen, the process is a continuous one. In a battery of ten cells, eight are always under pressure, one filling and one emptying. A moment's thought will show why the liquid should always enter from the top except in the case mentioned. In each case the charge of liquid which is to be forced out contains more sugar and is of a higher specific gravity than that entering. Coming in from the top, the light liquor forces the heavier out with a minimum of admixture, whereas, should the current set the other way the heavy liquor above would become so thoroughly mingled with the lighter juice entering from below that the object of the process would be largely defeated.

Allowing the liquid to enter the cell containing the fresh chips from below is merely a matter of convenience. Each cell is furnished with a valve at the top to allow the air to escape as the liquid enters. This device works better when the liquid enters from the bottom. To accomplish this, however, one extra set of valves has to be employed and therefore this arrangement is often omitted.

A study of the outline of the process given above will show that the juice which is drawn off to be sent to the defacators was taken from the cell last filled with chips; that is, it is the juice which is most highly charged with sugar. The cell which is emptied each time is at the opposite end of the line and contains the chips which have had sixteen successive diffusions, eight for the eight charges of juice drawn off, and eight for the successive transfer of juice from cell to cell.

CARBONATATION.

The process of carbonatation, in the manufacture of beet sugar, is conducted as follows: To the juices obtained by diffusion or pressure is added lime in the proportion of from 1½ to 3 per cent., according to the amount of impurities present. After thoroughly mixing, the limed juice is pumped into tanks which are furnished with a steam-jacket for heating the mass, and have, in the bottom, a coil of perforated pipe connected by an air pump with the source of carbonic acid, usually a lime kiln. The gas is now pumped through the juice until nearly all the lime has been precipitated in the form of carbonate. The temperature is now raised to the boiling point, which operation has the double purpose of causing the precipitate to settle rapidly and to decompose any sucro-carbonate of lime that has been formed, and which, being insoluble, would otherwise cause a loss of product. The carbonated juice is now sent to settling tanks or a filter press, and the clean juice is again mixed with lime, but not more than ½ per cent., and again carbonated until all the lime possible has been thrown down. After passing again through the filter press and also through the bone black, if desired, the juice is thoroughly purified, and is ready for the double or triple effect.

In applying this process to cane juices certain changes in it had to be made to suit the different nature of the juices to be treated.

Many of the impurities in cane and beet juices are the same, and hence, in general, what is true of the treatment of one can also be predicted of the other. But there is one radical difference. Beet juice contains no sugar which will reduce an alkaline copper solution, that is, none of those sugars commonly known as glucose. On the other hand cane juices, and especially those obtained from sorghum, contain a great deal of that substance. As is well known to chemists, lime, especially at a high temperature, acts vigorously on glucose, forming with it black and bitter compounds which would be likely to seriously interfere with the products, especially the molasses.

To avoid these dangers the experiments were conducted as follows: First of all the quantity of lime which was used was made as small as possible. Cane juices apparently require less lime than those of beets, and the maximum which it was found necessary to use was 1½ per cent. Next, the temperature was carefully looked after. It was found that if during the process of carbonatation the temperature was not allowed to rise above 40° C., no serious decomposition of the glucose took place. When all but two-tenths of 1 per cent. per liter of the lime was precipitated at this temperature the heat was applied and the liquid carried as rapidly as possible to the boiling point.

It is evident that all idea of a second carbonatation would have to be abandoned. Indeed, the filtered liquid of the first process afforded a juice which was remarkably pure, and which did not seem to require any further treatment.

It had been the hope of the chemist to try the process of carbonatation on a large scale in connection with the trial of diffusion, but when it was decided to make the diffusion experiment in duplicate he saw all of the available funds already engaged, and was compelled to give up the idea.

After reaching Kansas, however, he was informed by Messrs. Parkinson and Scovell that they had on hand an air-pump and tanks which could be fitted for carbonatation at small expense, and also filter-presses. When this was known it was determined to make the trial even at the risk of being somewhat short of funds for the two diffusion experiments. Accordingly a lime-kiln was built, connections made, and the experiment made.

The kiln was built of stone, 6 feet internal diameter at bottom, 2 feet at the top, and 2 feet high. It was lined with fire-clay brick. At the bottom three doors were constructed for the purpose of removing the burnt lime. Three furnaces were also built, external to the kiln. These were constructed of fire-clay brick and were fed with coke. The limestone was put in at the top of the kiln as occasion required. The top was covered with a plate of cast-iron, having a circular door in the center which was removed when limestone was to be added or when the gas-pump was not working. Near the top two 4-inch pipes on opposite sides served to carry off the gases when the pump was in motion. Since these gases had a temperature of several hundred degrees on leaving the furnace it was necessary to wash and cool them before they passed through the pump and into the carbonating pans. For this purpose the gases, as they left the furnace, were conducted into an iron vessel, where they were brought into contact with a spray of cold water, which washed them of impurities and cooled them to a proper degree for use. Since the volume of gas was greatly reduced by the process, a single 4-inch pipe was sufficient to connect the washer with the air-pump.

When the process of carbonatation first begins large quantities of foam are formed, which, unless some means of preventing it are used, pours over the sides of the pan and produces considerable loss. To avoid this, some lard is added to the liquid, and near the top of the pan a steam pipe is placed with a row of small holes directed inward and upward. The steam issuing from these apertures into the foam prevents it from going over the sides of the pan. After the operation is once well under way no further trouble from foaming is experienced. Although all the apparatus except the kiln was improvised for the purpose, the success of the experiments was most gratifying, showing a product which for purity and flavor was far superior to that obtained by the ordinary methods. In addition to this it must not be forgotten that by the process of carbonatation all loss in scums is avoided. There is no skimming of the juice. All the impurities go down with the precipitated lime and the whole is collected in hard cakes between the plates of the filter-press, where, just previous to being removed, they are washed with a little warm water to extract any sugar they may contain. It is believed that in a factory working 150 tons of cane per day the saving in this respect alone for one year would be enough to pay the cost of an entire carbonatation apparatus.

The fact that sorghum cane yields a large amount of coloring matter to the diffusion juices alone renders the use of diffusion without carbonatation unsuitable to that plant. The process of carbonatation appears to entirely remove this coloring matter and the juice, which enters the carbonatation pans a dirty red, emerges from the filter-press a limpid and light lemon-colored liquor.

So much can not be said for the process in respect of the gums which sorghum juice contains or which are so readily produced in it by the mucous ferment, to which the diffusion juice is so obnoxious. Unhappily no method of removing these soluble gums has yet been discovered.

In conclusion, it can be said that the Department is much encouraged by the results of the experiments made, while it still realizes the many difficulties to be overcome before all the problems connected with successful sugar manufacture are solved. With the continued sympathy and support of those interested in the sugar industry and with that material aid which it can so justly and so hopefully ask of the Congress it seems reasonable to expect that the beginnings which have been made will lead to results alike creditable to the Department of Agriculture and beneficial to the country.

Mr. SEYMOUR. Mr. Speaker, whatever shape the present discussion may assume during its progress and before a final vote is taken, I believe that the practical question, the question in which the country is most interested, is the one to which our attention has been called by the President and the Secretary of the Treasury, namely, whether the present compulsory coinage of silver dollars shall continue or be suspended. At any rate I shall assume, as in duty bound in courtesy to the intelligence of this House, that a free-coinage act, freighted with all the dangers necessarily involved in it, will not be precipitated upon an unwilling country, and shall address myself to the arguments pertinent to the practical questions involved—arguments which, if worth anything for the purposes for which I shall use them, are of double value and significance against propositions for free coinage.

The discussion of the questions under consideration necessarily leads into the fields of conjecture. The situation is in many respects anomalous, and full precedents for action are hardly to be expected. Instead of the judicial temper which these facts ought to excite, a strong tendency is everywhere manifested in the opposite direction. A disposition is exhibited on the part of the advocates of the continued and unlimited coinage of silver dollars to denounce the motives of those entertaining a different opinion. They have not hesitated to speak of them as conspirators against the welfare of the country, as combined together to defraud and oppress the poor. They have accused them of covertly attempting to enrich themselves in violation of law and in the face of contract obligations.

The silver controversy has, by them, been described as a contest between the bondholders and those having fixed incomes on the one side, and the laborers, middle classes, and debtors on the other. The most unjust attacks have been made and the most dangerous passions appealed to. On the other hand those favoring a restriction of coinage are not slow to suggest that it is the selfishness of those interested in the production of silver metal and in putting and keeping it at an unnatural price, far above its intrinsic and commercial value, which has, to an extent, debauched public opinion until it is blind to the financial dangers which are threatened by its unlimited coinage. They insist that, under such debauched public sentiment, a large debtor constituency are clamoring for action which will in effect scale their indebtedness down by 20 per cent. or more, and clamoring for it, under whatever disguise, because it will thus reduce their indebtedness. So that instead of a conspiracy by the creditors against the debtors it is a conspiracy of the debtors against the creditors, which, if successful, may, indeed, temporarily help the debtor, but in the long run will injure even such debtor as only unsound financial measures can, and to every other poor man will be a savor of death unto death.

Having recourse to a very common expedient, the advocates of unlimited coinage assume in their arguments that all who favor present suspension are monometallists and favor the demonetization of silver. The object of such unwarranted assumption is not far to look for when we consider how much easier it is to attack an extreme view than to argue against a moderate and conservative view and how strong is the temptation to exaggerate the opinions of an opponent whose conservative opinions it seems difficult to attack. It does not require a financier to discover that the question whether we shall have dollars of different worth is very different from the question whether we shall have dollars composed of two different metals. There is no necessary connection between the two questions, nor is the policy of bimetallism attacked by disparaging the policy of continuing to buy silver far in excess of any demand for it as coin.

All sides in this controversy are agreed in one thing. All insist that no class of people is so deeply interested in the establishment and permanence of a sound financial policy as the poor and the men of moderate means. They are the men first to feel the dire effects of hard times and business stagnation. They feel it, not as the rich man does, in the necessity for sacrificing this or that article of luxury, but it comes to them in the shape of want, hunger, and distress. All sides ought also to be agreed in another thing, namely, to so shape legislation that the laborer may be protected against the evils incident to an unsound financial policy. And as prophecies are in order in this discussion, I prophesy that the laboring class will have bitter cause to regret it if the silvery stream is permitted to rise until it drives gold out of circulation and substitutes itself instead as our sole circulating medium.

The arguments in favor of a double standard for our currency, in the present condition of affairs, seem conclusive. I know it is assumed and asserted, as already suggested, that the opponents of free coinage are combined in favor of actually demonetizing silver and making gold the sole medium of circulation; yet, as every well-informed man knows, the assumption is gratuitous and the assertion unfounded. Both are made for the double purpose of exciting prejudice and furnishing an excuse for arguments which are utterly foreign to the real issue. Can any one be ignorant that one of the strongest reasons urged in favor of the present suspension of our coinage act is that it is a decided step which will do more to induce the countries comprising the Latin Union and other foreign nations to co-operate with us in measures looking to a common ratio between gold and silver, and to establishing internationally the use of bimetallic money, than any thing else we can do?

The argument in favor of bimetalism being conceded, no one contends that it is good policy to permit the two metals, of which our principal coins are made, to differ as between their intrinsic value and their coin value, if it can be helped or any more than it can be helped. Certainly it would be bad policy to enact, or permit to remain on the statute-book, laws which necessarily lead to that result, unless, indeed, some overwhelming necessity compels it. In a sound state of finances a gold dollar and a silver dollar will be of equal intrinsic value, and any wide departure from that equality must excite alarm. And, to quote the language of General Walker at the international monetary conference of 1878, "if there is any one thing which political economy declares with an unfaltering voice it is that the principal money, circulating in the hands of the people of any country, should be of full metalic value."

The act of February 28, 1878, commonly known as the Bland act, provided, among other things, that—

> There shall be coined, at the several mints of the United States, silver dollars of the weight of 412½ grains troy of standard silver, as provided in the act of January 18, 1837, on which shall be the devices and superscriptions provided by said act; which coins, together with all silver dollars heretofore coined by the United States, of like weight and fineness, shall be a legal tender at their nominal value for all debts and dues, public and private, except where otherwise expressly stipulated in the contract. And the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to purchase, from time to time, silver bullion, at the market price thereof, not less than two million dollars' worth per month, nor more than four million dollars' worth per month, and cause the same to be coined monthly, as fast as so purchased, into such dollars, &c.

This law is believed, by the best financial talent of the country, to be subject to the objection just mentioned of contributing by its continued operation to a dangerous difference in the value of gold and silver money, thus exposing us to all the evils which result from such a situation. For this, and for other reasons which I shall shortly give, its suspension is demanded by a large, patriotic, and highly intelligent body of our fellow-citizens. On the other hand, its distinguished author and those who belong to his school of ideas not only defend the working of the present law, so far as it goes, but insist that its only fault is that it does not go far enough, and propose free and unlimited coinage of silver dollars as the true policy for the future.

I desire fairly to present the facts which the advocates of suspension consider pertinent to the discussion, to state the arguments drawn from such facts and the conclusions to which they naturally lead. I have no pet theory to vindicate, no constituency which desires anything but the best interests of the whole country and jealous regard for the welfare of the laboring man. While failing to participate in the more extreme anticipations of immediate danger from a continuance of the present law, yet I think it has proved to be an unwise law, one that continually leads toward danger and is sure in the end to bring disaster. The Treasury vaults, heaped up with silver dollars, pronounce in unmistakable terms against its necessity, and it stands in the way of that international concurrence respecting the ratio of gold to silver which is desired by all bimetallists in this country as the surest if not the only means of preserving to both metals the monetary positions to which they are entitled.

Among the more significant facts to which the advocates of a suspension of coinage point as bearing upon the subject and influencing their judgment may be mentioned the following: In 1835, fifty years ago, the intrinsic value of the silver dollar, as measured by the equivalent of the gold dollar, was $1.012. In 1874 it was $1.004. Between those dates the variation was very slight, the highest point reached being $1.055 in 1865, and the lowest $1.003 in 1843.

In 1874 the value of silver began to fall. Various reasons are given for its decline. The action of Germany in demonetizing it and thereby throwing upon the world's market, as a commodity, the large amount which had theretofore been used as currency was no doubt a principal one. It was mainly such action on the part of Germany that decided the states which compose the Latin Union to first restrict the coinage of silver and then, in 1878, while we were passing laws for its compulsory coinage, to suspend it entirely. I have not heard such fall in the value of silver attributed to the enmity of the then administration, nor to hostile action on the part of our Government officials to prevent its circulation, though it is persistently asserted to-day that the assumed hostility of the present administration is a chief cause of its present depreciation. Nor have I discovered that the passage of the Bland act, though invoked on every hand, when under discussion as the great panacea for the surrounding evils, was of any effect in sustaining the value of the metal in whose interest it was passed. For in 1874 the intrinsic value of the silver dollar, measured by the gold standard, was 0.988; in 1875, 0.964; in 1876, 0.894; in 1877, 0.929; in 1878, 0.891; in 1879, 0.868; in 1880, 0.885; in 1881, 0.880; in 1882, 0.878; in 1883, 0.868; in 1884, 0.860; and in November, 1885, 0.805, with a still downward tendency.

As also pertinent to the discussion the further facts are suggested: That foreign exchange is calculated in gold; that gold is the standard of value in the foreign commerce of the United States as well as of the nations of Europe; that the countries from whence come more than four-fifths of our imports, and to which we sell all but a very insignificant portion of our exports, use the gold standard; that with free coinage of silver into legal-tender dollars there was a demand for the coinage of only $8,045,838 from 1793, when the first were coined, down to the year 1878, since when, under the unnatural law of compulsion, some two hundred and fifteen millions have been coined. The exact amount, as given in the recent report of the Treasurer, Mr. Jordan, was, October 31, 1885, $213,259,431, of which only $49,442,089 were in circulation, leaving $163,817,342 in the Treasury. Against this latter sum were outstanding silver certificates in circulation to the amount of $93,146,772, leaving in the Treasury $50,670,570. Or, if there should also be deducted, as some insist, the $31,906,514 of silver certificates which have been paid into the Treasury and are held as cash, on the theory that they will be paid out again and so require silver dollars to be kept in hand to redeem them, then leaving in the Treasury 18,763,956 silver dollars, or considerably more than double the entire number coined for the previous eighty-five years, and lying as useless as if the metal from which they were coined was still undiscovered in the mines.

Upon the question whether a portion of the silver dollars lying in the Treasury can in any proper sense be said to be in quasi circulation because of the outstanding silver certificates, it should be borne in mind that so long as such certificates are "receivable for customs, taxes, and all public dues," there is little likelihood of their being redeemed with silver dollars. So that practically the statement is correct that of the two hundred and thirteen million and over silver dollars coined since 1878 less than fifty millions are in actual circulation.

Another impressive fact is contained in the same report, namely, that during the past year, for the first time since 1878, notwithstanding the alleged increasing demand for the silver dollar, more of them were returned to the Treasury than were issued from it, the excess being $1,196,934. So there are now two silver streams running into the Treasury—one of fresh coined dollars, and another of dollars which, after a forced and feeble circulation of short duration, hasten back to the only place which is tolerant of them.

It also further appears that while the total amount outstanding has been increasing, up to the end of the year 1884, as the amount coined increased, yet the percentage of the outstanding to the total coinage has fallen from 30.8 per cent. in 1881 to 18.8 per cent. at the close of the fiscal year 1885, the strongest possible demonstration that we are coining faster than the demand warrants.

The Treasurer says:

> It is apparent that the execution of the coinage act is gradually converting the funds of the Treasury into standard dollars. Every exertion has been made to give an extended circulation to these coins, but without the success which the large expenditure incurred would warrant.

Now, Mr. Speaker, with these and other well-understood facts before them, the advocates of suspension argue that the silver dollar can not keep its proper relation with the gold standard if the compulsory coinage of silver continues, and much less if free coinage should be established; that the addition of two million silver dollars per month must necessarily result at last in the substitution of silver for all the gold the Government owns, it being hardly possible that the continued payment of that amount of gold for the required amount of silver should bear any other fruit; that hoarding of gold will then be in order, withdrawing it from circulation, putting it at a higher and higher premium, and finally resulting in a practical demonetization of it for domestic transactions; that when silver begins to approach gold in amount there will be a premium on the hoarding and export of gold measured by the difference of value of the two metals, a hoarding which has already commenced and the effects of which are already perceptible.

I know it is said, and truly said, that since 1878 the imports of gold have exceeded the exports by something like $20,000,000 a year and that we have a much larger stock of gold in the country now than then. All of which shows that the increase of silver dollars has not yet reached the point where it begins to drive gold out of the country faster than it comes in, and the disturbance has not begun. Even as, only the other day, this city was as undisturbed by the flood of waters as if the ice was not piling up beyond Georgetown to break into ruin and disaster only when more and more water should be added to the flood behind it, so except to the watchful eye of experience and anticipation our prosperity is not injuriously affected by the present accumulation of silver dollars, but the time must come if the present coinage is continued, and in the subtle changes of financial relations no one can tell how quickly, when the safe proportion between gold and silver money, already terribly out of joint, will be completely overthrown and the silver, as it has done before, will sweep everything away before it.

Mr. Speaker, these and the kindred arguments which are urged seem to me entitled to great weight and to be worthy of grave consideration, especially in view of the fact that the remedy for the anticipated trouble by a temporary and tentative suspension of compulsory coinage is so easy and safe of application. They are the arguments of men versed in the science of finance; men whose patriotism and unselfish devotion to the best interests of the country will survive all attacks upon their motives. Nor are they the arguments of to-day alone. Nor are the warnings first heard from this administration. The Secretary of the Treasury under the last administration, Mr. McCulloch, in his annual report for the year 1884, after discussing the subject of coinage and giving a table which he says shows that there was October 31, 1884, no surplus gold in the Treasury and that the reserve had been trenched upon, and that no plethora existed except of silver dollars, for which there was no demand, proceeds as follows:

> After giving the subject careful consideration I have been forced to the conclusion that, unless both the coinage of silver dollars and the issue of silver certificates are suspended, there is danger that silver, and not gold, may become our metallic standard. This danger may not be imminent, but it is of so serious a character that there ought not to be delay in providing for it. Not only would the national credit be seriously impaired if the Government should be under the necessity of using silver dollars in payment of gold obligations, but business of all kinds would be greatly disturbed; not only so, but gold would at once cease to be a circulating medium, and severe contraction would be the result. The United States is one of the most powerful of nations, its credit is high, its resources limitless; but it can not prevent a depreciation of silver unless its efforts are aided by leading nations of Europe. If the coinage of silver is continued in despite of the action of Germany in demonetizing it and the limitation of its coinage by what are known as the Latin nations, there can be but one result: silver will practically become the standard of value. Our mines produce large amounts of silver, and it is important, therefore, that there should be a good demand for it, at remunerative prices, for the outlays in obtaining it. The suspension of its coinage might depress the market price of silver for a time, but the ultimate effect would doubtless be to enhance it. * * * The very necessities of the commercial world will prevent a general and continued disuse of either gold or silver as money. The European nations which hold large amounts of silver must sooner or later come to its rescue, and the suspension of coinage in the United States would do much to bring about, on their part, action in its favor. But, whatever might be the effect of the suspension of the coinage upon the commercial value of silver, it is very clear that the coinage can not be continued without detriment to general business and damage to the national credit.

Thus spoke President Arthur's Secretary of the Treasury.

The present administration, with no uncertain sound, announces its participation in the same fears and emphasizes the same warnings. It will not avail to attack the President's motives nor to denounce him as engaged in a great conspiracy against silver. No attack could be weaker. The people have long since learned to respect his judgment and to honor his motives. He, in common with the thousands of practical financiers who hold the same opinions, may possibly be mistaken; but to accuse him of acting in the interest of bondholders and creditors against any less favored class is to be willfully blind to his entire public life and to confess the weakness of a cause that depends upon such methods for success.

The coinage of silver as provided for in the present law will, of course, operate more slowly in bringing about the anticipated evils than a free-coinage act would. But in the end the result will be pretty much the same. To be sure, under the present law, and it is an advantage in its favor as between it and free coinage, individuals can not purchase silver at say 80 cents and taking it to the Mint turn it into 100 cents by having it coined.

It has been argued during this discussion, either here or in the Senate, that the Government by buying at a depreciated price and issuing at par makes the difference and no one is the loser; that, therefore, in one sense the depreciation inures to the advantage of all citizens alike. But how does the Government make the difference? It issues what cost but 80 cents as 100, thereby making 20 cents; but it is obliged to take back "for customs, taxes, and all public dues" at 100 cents what is worth only 80, thereby losing 20 cents. And, besides, the argument shows an entire failure to appreciate the advantage, nay, the financial necessity, of preventing, if possible, the metals which comprise a country's currency from parting company in respect to their values—a necessity which no authority upon the subject which I have ever consulted fails to insist upon. One who seriously makes the argument would no doubt consider it a supreme stroke of financiering if the Government, returning to wampum as a medium of commerce, should purchase shells at a penny apiece and issue them for dollars, thereby making 99 cents for each dollar issued.

The tables, to which reference has already been made, show that silver steadily continued to fall after the legislation of 1878, and, considering that it is the metal of one of our legal-tenders, that it has long since reached an alarming point of depreciation.

Mr. Speaker, this is not the first time in this country or in other countries that silver has fallen in its relative value to gold. It fell early in the present century owing to causes which will presently be suggested, and President Jefferson during his second term summarily and of his own motion ordered its coinage to be suspended. Mr. Upton, late Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, in a work recently published by him declares that Mr. Jefferson took this course in a crisis similar to the one upon which we have fallen, for the purpose of preventing the expulsion of gold coin by the cheaper silver, and to stimulate its circulation side by side with silver, in the importance of which he was as firm a believer as is the present Executive.

Professor Laughlin, in his History of Bimetallism in the United States, says that he can find no proof that the reason attributed by Mr. Upton for Mr. Jefferson's action is the correct one. It may be that Mr. Upton, knowing that gold was being expelled from circulation by the cheaper silver, knowing that the President suspended the coinage of the latter, and further knowing that there was a rally in silver from 1805 to 1813, inferred, without sufficient proof, that the step was taken for the purpose of preventing the further withdrawal of gold from circulation and arresting the further decline of silver. From 1805 to 1836 no silver dollars were coined. At the latter date the amount of silver dollars that had been coined for circulation was, all told, only 1,439,517. From 1836 to 1873 there were coined 6,606,321. From 1875 to the present that coinage has amounted to the enormous sum of two hundred and fifteen million silver dollars, and yet, let me again recall the fact, from 1836 to 1875 the intrinsic value of the silver dollar, compared with the gold, was, always, above par, while from 1873 to date it has always been below par.

I know the efforts that are made to explain away the significance of this showing; they are ingenious and varied, sometimes conflicting and almost always angry, but it must stand for what it is worth. Such depreciation can not be charged to the discontinuance of the coinage of silver dollars in 1873, because that act did not take away the legal-tender quality of those already coined but left them with all the properties they ever had. To be sure in 1874, by what was probably an error of the revising committee, the legal-tender attribute of the silver dollar was taken away for payments exceeding $5, but in 1878 that attribute was restored by the Bland bill, and the stimulus of an artificial and compulsory issue of not less than two millions per month was added. But to no purpose; it did not check the fall in value, as it must have done had such fall been due, as some fondly say, to the act of 1873. I have already suggested that an oft-repeated argument in favor of the Bland bill of 1878 was that it would put a stop to further depreciation and restore the proper relation between gold and silver.

A quotation from the remarks of Mr. Bundy, of New York, will illustrate the anticipations which were freely indulged in at that time. In speaking upon this point, he said:

> But, Mr. Speaker, while I am aware that silver to-day relatively to gold is at a discount I desire to negative the supposition even that I advocate the silver dollar as a cheap means of paying the nation's creditors. I am firm in the belief that silver should be utilized for other purposes than the arts and as a commodity, with merely commercial value, and that the restoring its usefulness as money will go far toward restoring its former value—the equal and superior of gold. And while I can not now go into the discussion of that topic I am convinced that but a short time will be needed to remove all possible infirmities of silver as a legal-tender coin.

The predictions of 1878 have not been fulfilled. Is there no other line of policy worth trying? Other countries are said to have resorted to the expedient of suspending its coinage to keep their silver coin from falling in value. The Secretary of the Treasury in his recent report to Congress cites the action of France to that effect as one.

The fears of those who favor present suspension of silver coinage in this country, that unless similar action is taken here the cheaper silver will drive out of circulation the dearer gold, and that the natural and historical consequences of such a condition will surely follow, are not unreasonable. To entertain and express such fears is not necessarily to conspire against the welfare of the country nor willfully to attempt to defraud the poor. Is it not a general rule established by experience that as between the different coins of the realm the cheaper metal tends to expel the dearer?

In our own country, at the beginning of the century, silver became cheaper than gold and a considerable amount found its way to the Mint. In 1809 1 pound of gold was worth in market 16½ pounds of silver, though the legal relation of 1 to 15 remained unchanged. So gold became a commodity; it was sent abroad to pay for imports, and silver became the circulating medium. Mr. Jefferson, as already stated, during his last administration, caused the coinage of silver to be suspended. In 1834 Congress changed the legal ratio of the two metals from 1 to 15 to 1 to 16 by reducing the weight of pure gold in the gold eagle from 247.5 grains to 232 grains. This made gold money cheaper than silver money, and the latter in its turn became the unit of account, and the cheaper metal, this time gold, drove the dearer out of circulation and silver became a commodity.

But I must hasten to conclude. With silver falling in value, with an enforced coinage of two million silver dollars a month, with no demand for them sufficient to put what are coined into circulation, with past experience and the united voices of statesmen and financiers warning us against the dangers likely to result from over silver coinage, with an easy remedy at hand, what shall we do? Shall we continue the present law, or, what is worse, extend its operations, and risk a financial crash which will silence the busy industries of the field and shop, or shall we seek to avoid the danger by suspending the present operation of the law from which so many disturbances are predicted?

As I said at the outset the discussion of this subject leads into the fields of conjecture. Possibly the predictions indulged in may not be fulfilled whatever course is pursued. Some new and unforeseen factor may intervene and change the natural current of events. But I do not understand how any thoughtful man can escape the conviction that there is danger, nor be unwilling to give credit to the disinterestedness of those who seek to avert it by safe action.

No public harm can come from suspending the coinage act until, at least, the dollars already heaped up are drawn into circulation and a demand for further coinage is felt by some one besides the producers of silver—a business demand which will indicate that the interests of trade are requiring it. And, what is of great importance just now when Germany is showing signs of interest in the matter, we shall, by such suspension, do much to force England, who, notwithstanding her gold standard, has great interest in the maintenance of silver as currency, but is content to let us fight the battle for silver so long as we are content to do it. We shall force her to become our ally in seeking to establish an international ratio between silver and gold, without which the fight can not be successful. If suspension is impossible, nay, if free coinage is possible, there is consolation in the reflection that our credit is so good and our resources so immense that the country can stand a great deal of unwise legislation and still survive long enough to repeal it.

Mr. Speaker, I can not better sum up the situation nor better present the fears which I entertain, and the arguments which compel me to entertain them, than by quoting a few words from the report of Mr. Cannon, Comptroller of the Currency—words admirable as well for their candor and moderation as for their sound reasoning and accurate inference. He said:

> The Comptroller, in his last report to Congress, stated that he believed the operation of the present law, which compels the coinage of two million standard dollars per month, weighing only 412½ grains each, with unlimited legal-tender quality, would eventually bring financial disturbance upon the country, and he is still of the same opinion. * * *
> The discontinuance of the coinage of the silver dollar by our Government might perhaps have a tendency to bring about some agreement with other nations and the fixing of a standard for a series of years. It is, however, evident that the coinage of the standard silver dollar under the present law is in excess of the requirements of the country and should be discontinued. If we continue to add these dollars to our circulating medium, and they continue to accumulate in the Treasury, the Government must of necessity pay some portion of its obligations in that coin; and if the Government should pay its interest and other obligations and redeem its bonds in standard dollars the business of the country would immediately go to a silver basis. What effect this would have it is difficult to predict. It would appear, however, that gold would go to a premium, which would compel its being held, to a certain extent, as an article of merchandise, and it would not circulate as money. This would probably occasion contraction in credits and financial disturbance.

Let no man deceive himself in this matter, nor yet be deceived by the persistent attempts to create class jealousies and to array capital and labor in a seeming conflict.

Nothing is more discouraging than the growing tendency to exaggerate rather than to lessen class distinctions, and to array men of different occupations against each other. I say men of different occupations, because in this busy country the really idle are so few that it would be ridiculous to make a significant class of them. Nearly all are laborers, and those who contribute nothing to the common wealth by the labor of the hand or the ofttimes more exhausting labor of the brain are of little account in the problem.

I do not understand why capital and labor are not alike interested in the proper solution of the question at issue. Self-appointed leaders of the workingmen are prating of cheap money. But money, even where there is no question of equivalency between two coin metals, may be too cheap; cheap enough to mean, to the very men whose cause they so ignorantly champion, dear food, dear fuel, and dear clothing.

The more abundant money is the less its relative purchasing power; and those who labor for wages, producing nothing to sell on their own account, while they may get more money in volume for their work when money is cheap, will find, by the law of natural compensation, that its purchasing power is diminished in proportion. And so those who produce to sell, while their products grow dearer as money grows cheaper, yet they too are subject to this general law of compensation when they in turn are obliged to exchange the money they have received for their own products for articles produced by others.

There may most certainly, also, be a scarcity of money, as urged by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] in his recent speech. A scarcity which, when it reaches a certain point, will produce all the evils so eloquently depicted by him. No one disagrees with him on that point or is second to him in deploring the disasters which such a scarcity might bring about. But neither asserting the fact nor deploring the consequent evils touches, or even tends to touch, the question at issue, except to beg it.

The real contention is whether, with our present stock of gold and silver money, the aggregate being, January 1, 1886, of gold, as estimated by the Director of the Mint, $553,810,148, and of silver $293,293,872—an amount so large as to shut out the argument of scarcity as an excuse for further coinage, at least until some way is found to entice silver dollars from the Government vaults out into the tide of circulation—I say the contention is whether with this stock on hand our compulsory coinage can be continued without dangerous results. It is a question upon which men may honestly differ, and I suppose do honestly differ, notwithstanding the persistent attacks upon motives which the latitude of debate in the present day seems to permit among gentlemen.

Mr. Speaker, there is a safe and happy mean between too much and too little money; between too much and too little of one kind of money in a bimetallic country which comes, if it comes at all, through the natural law of supply and demand, aided by such wholesome laws as experience may dictate and disinterested legislation enact.

As one anxious to advocate every such wholesome law, to the end that the prosperity of our country and the true interests of labor may be thereby advanced, I am compelled to favor the suspension of the coinage of silver dollars and to protest against any and all legislation in favor of free coinage such as is contemplated in the bill the adverse report to which is now under consideration—a bill which, if it should become a law, would, in my deliberate judgment, produce a financial panic which would involve every section of our beloved country in a common disaster.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, if I can get unanimous consent I wish to make a proposition to gentlemen who desire further to debate this question——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BURNES. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I will do so.

URGENT DEFICIENCIES.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Speaker, I respectfully ask unanimous consent of the House to make a privileged report, which will not occupy more than a half minute's time of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The report, will be read, subject to objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5893) to provide for certain of the most urgent deficiencies in the appropriations of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes, together with the amendments numbered 2, 6, and 7 of the Senate thereto, having considered the same, beg leave to report as follows:

That the House further insist upon its disagreement to the said amendments numbered 2, 6, 7 of the Senate, and ask a conference on the same.

Mr. REED, of Maine. What is the order under which the House is now sitting?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the order for to-day.

Mr. BURNES. I will state to the gentleman that this is contrary to the order heretofore made setting apart this day, and this report can be made only by unanimous consent.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I think it is hardly a fair proposition to put the onus of making an objection upon any individual member.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that under the order of the House to-day the silver bill is made a special order for consideration and debate.

Mr. REED, of Maine. It is not our regular Saturday session for debate?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No; the order is unlike that. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There being no objection, the report of the committee was considered and adopted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore announced as conferees on the part of the House Mr. BURNES, Mr. RANDALL, and Mr. MCCOMAS.

FREE COINAGE OF SILVER.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. The suggestion I was about to make was this: That we do something to make this more of a debate than it can possibly be if we are to sit here for several days merely to listen to essays. I suggest that both sides yield to courteous interruptions and questions, in order to give this more the character of debate, and so as thereby to elicit the truth and the exact situation. I have no doubt the gentleman in charge of the bill will say on behalf of the silver men that his side are willing that the debate should be of the character I have suggested, and I ask gentlemen on the other side to concur in the suggestion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair submits that that is a question which is under the control of the gentleman who occupies the floor for the time being as to whether he shall yield or what interrogatory he shall answer.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Certainly; but gentlemen who now know whether they are to occupy the floor can say whether they will object to interruption. What I desire is to have an understanding that an interrogatory shall not be considered an intrusion.

Mr. BLAND. There are a number of gentlemen who have not been heard upon this question and who are not present. The suggestion of the gentleman from Iowa is one that would have to meet the approval of every member who desires to address the House, and it could not be carried out except by the consent of all the gentlemen who are going to participate in the debate.

Mr. HEMPHILL. How much time remains to the gentleman who last occupied the floor?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. SEYMOUR] reserves the remainder of his time.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I yield it to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. HEMPHILL. How much of the gentleman's time is yielded to me?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Ten minutes.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I ask the Chair to notify me when I shall have occupied an hour. I desire to transfer the time now yielded to me to another gentleman.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Carolina will proceed.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Speaker, the question as to the financial policy of our Government as it relates to the present coinage of the precious metals is of the greatest possible import to the people of the whole country. It should receive deliberate and unbiased consideration. I may be excused for saying that it has not in my opinion been so treated by many of those who have addressed this Congress in favor of the further compulsory coinage of silver.

Instead of discussing this as a naked question of finance which should stand or fall on its own merits, the burden of their argument consists in an attack upon the honesty of the press, the patriotism of property-owners, and the good sense of the President and the Secretary of the Treasury.

The absolute want of proof on the part of these gentlemen in support of such charges they attempt to supply by the strength of their assertions and the vehemence of their denunciation and abuse of those who dare to differ with them in opinion. They ought to know and remember that the hard names they apply and the cruel manner in which they attempt to hold these people up to the contempt of mankind do not answer the points made against them and contribute nothing to the solution of the great problem before us. And whatever may be the motive of such speeches—and as to that I say nothing—the effect is to prejudice the minds of the people against the President and those who with him seek some wise and conservative settlement of this momentous question; they tend to forestall public opinion, and to stampede the people into the adoption of a policy that many prudent men believe will work to their everlasting injury.

But the gentlemen on the other side have not been more reckless in their charges than in the statement of the issue now pending before this Congress. They reiterate that it is a question of the demonetization of silver. They do not show that any measure is pending for that purpose, or that any one here advocates such a doctrine. On the contrary, no such bill has been before the committee, none is pending in the House, and no man has advanced such a notion on this floor.

The real problem is this: The Secretary of the Treasury being now by law compelled to coin two millions of silver dollars per month, whether the business of the country requires it or not, it being confessed that silver bullion is, and has been for a number of years, continually depreciating in value; that in the opinion of many thoughtful and patriotic citizens we are threatened with a fall from a gold to a single silver standard of value, thus throwing gold to a premium and putting $600,000,000 of this metal out of circulation, with the attendant loss and ruin, the question is, what, if anything, can be done to avert this calamity, and if possible restore the two metals to an equivalency and have them both float as money.

But four expedients have been suggested, and these I will endeavor to discuss.

First. To continue the present compulsory coinage of silver at the rate of $2,000,000 per month irrespective of the demands of business or the laws of trade.

Second. To establish free and unlimited coinage of silver for all comers.

Third. Require the Secretary of the Treasury to keep in his vaults at least $20,000,000 as a reserve fund, and whenever the requirements of trade or the wants of the people reduce that sum then a sufficient amount shall be coined to restore it.

Fourth. To suspend the compulsory coinage now; or if preferred, suspend at a future day, with a provision for a commission in this latter case to secure an international bimetallic union if possible.

In all of these the silver already coined is to remain in circulation as full legal-tender money.

In any discussion of this question it should be remembered that while we have as a circulating medium gold, silver, national-bank notes, and Treasury notes, the last two are not really money but merely representatives of money, and that the only genuine money is that which has an inherent value of its own. That alone is real money which does not depend for its value on law but on the precious metal that is in it, so that its real value is equal to its legal value, and whether minted into money or melted into bullion it is worth the same thing.

The standard silver dollar as now coined by this Government has neither a dollar's worth of silver in it nor is it even a promise to pay a dollar in the future. And every time the Government buys in the market 80 cents' worth of silver and stamps it as a dollar and pays it out to one of its citizens as such it stamps a falsehood on the face of its own coin and wrongs the man to whom it is paid.

It would be equally as honest and as just to purchase 80 cents' worth of gold, falsely stamp it as containing 100 cents, and pay it out as a dollar. Shall we continue to require the Secretary of the Treasury to perpetrate this gross injustice, and by forcing this cheap money on the country run gold to a premium, put the coin of this metal, amounting to over $600,000,000, out of circulation?

We might as well recognize the fact that there are certain laws of finance as fixed and invariable as the laws of the physical universe, and while various collateral forces may obstruct for a time their easy operation still their general trend and current remain always the same. One of these is that the cheaper money in circulation will eventually drive out the dearer. No one may predict the exact time when this will happen, but experience shows that its eventual occurrence is certain. Some of our friends seem to think that this rule is not applicable to us; that by some means or other Congress has been strong enough or smart enough to repeal Gresham's law, and they point to the fact that silver though only four-fifths of the value of gold still floats with it at par. But the question is how long will this continue, for what length of time will silver be able to resist this power that tends continually to pull it down to its real level?

A man may inflate a balloon with gas and send it high up into the heavens, and as it proudly floats above the clouds he may point to it as conclusively showing that there is no such law as that of gravitation tending to draw all things to the earth, or that he had successfully set it at defiance. But if unusual pressure come upon his machine, or the inflated surface be pricked, the gas escapes and the whole thing collapses and falls to the ground, with the theory of its master, in a tremendous crash and in obedience to the very law he was just proving to his own satisfaction had no existence. The same unhappy fate will attend upon those who deny the principles of Gresham's law or think we shall escape its operation.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I wish to ask the gentleman by what standard he measures the value of the silver dollar when he says it is only worth 80 cents?

Mr. HEMPHILL. I shall come to that directly, and show that by the statutes of the United States a "unit of value" has been fixed; and if we judge the silver dollar by the standard we have fixed for our own convenience, this is a legitimate argument and a necessary consequence of the standard we have established.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. But the law the gentleman refers to was passed before the passage of the Bland act. The Bland act virtually restored the silver dollar as a unit of value the same as the gold dollar.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I do not see how the law can virtually restore 80 cents to be a dollar, when you have the statute to which I have referred unrepealed.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. By what law is the silver dollar only worth 80 cents?

Mr. HEMPHILL. You can take a dollar of silver or of gold and buy 80 cents worth of silver and make a dollar of it.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. If you can do that, is it not worth a dollar?

Mr. HEMPHILL. It is not, from the simple fact that it costs the Government 80 cents and costs the people a dollar.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Then it is all right if they can pass it for a dollar.

Mr. HEMPHILL. We will come to that directly. But the function of money is not merely to pass from one man to another.

Mr. McCREARY. Will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. McCREARY. Is it not true that some thirteen years ago the silver dollar was worth 103 cents in gold?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. McCREARY. Was there any desire then to have the gold dollar recoined so as to put it on a par with silver?

Mr. HEMPHILL. I do not know that there was any such desire.

Mr. McCREARY. If we should cease to agitate the question, is there not some hope that the silver dollar may become equal in value with the gold dollar?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Some people have that hope, and others have not. The sentiment of the country is divided on that subject.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will my colleague permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. Can the Gresham law operate on any money that pays debts and taxes?

Mr. HEMPHILL. My notion about money is this: that it is not only the measure of value but that it is in itself value; it is wealth itself. And the man who has a gold dollar has that the metal of which is worth 100 cents; and he can store it away, and one hundred or fifty years hereafter it will be worth what it pretends to be. But a man who has a silver dollar is compelled to take it at 100 cents when it cost the Government 80 cents. And if you take away the support of the United States statute which makes a man take it, and it falls to 80 cents, the man who has a dollar in silver loses 20 cents while the man who has a gold dollar loses nothing.

Mr. PERKINS. May I ask the gentleman from South Carolina a question?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. PERKINS. What is it that makes the gold dollar worth 100 cents?

Mr. HEMPHILL. The inherent value of gold.

Mr. PERKINS. Then how was it in 1873 when the silver dollar was worth more than the gold dollar?

Mr. HEMPHILL. The real question is, can we ever bring it back to the same point.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Was it not the effect of the law demonetizing silver which put gold up and silver down?

Mr. HEMPHILL. There are a great many things which have helped to keep silver down. One is the great fuss you are making to persuade people to take it against their will.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. As the question of the Gresham law is an important one will my friend state——

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I object to these interruptions.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I do not know that the gentleman from Kentucky is entitled to object if the gentleman from South Carolina yields.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I would like to hear the gentleman from South Carolina proceed with his own discussion of the question.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I presume the gentleman from South Carolina is his own keeper. I do not know that he has placed himself under the special charge of the gentleman from Kentucky. The gentleman from South Carolina has alluded to the Gresham law——

Mr. WADSWORTH. Have I a right to object?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I do not wish to interrupt the gentleman from South Carolina unless it be agreeable to him. I quite agree in Gresham's law when it is correctly stated, and I ask the gentleman what he understands by Gresham's law.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I understand by it that eventually the cheaper money must drive out the dearer. That is the general proposition.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Quite true. But to what extent? Will a million dollars drive out a hundred millions of dollars?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Oh, no.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Correctly stated; then, will not the cheaper money drive out the dearer to the extent of its own volume, but no more?

Mr. HEMPHILL. I do not know but that is so.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I think there is no question about the correctness of Gresham's law as I have stated it.

Mr. HEMPHILL. The only question is as to the extent of its operation and what its effect will be.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. No, not quite that. The only question then is, the extent of the cheaper money. It will drive out the dearer to the extent of its own volume. A hundred millions of cheaper money will drive out a hundred millions of dearer money; two hundred millions of cheaper will drive out two hundred millions of dearer; but your present silver coinage, if no more be added, can never drive out the gold now in circulation, under Gresham's law.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I agree with the gentleman. If we coin no more we shall be safe, but suppose we go on coining silver?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. If you add a hundred millions of silver suddenly, then, undoubtedly, that will expel a hundred millions of the dearer money, but only a hundred millions.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I do not say that it is going to drive out every bit of it, but it will drive out a great deal, and if he can not have two kinds of money, one worth only 80 cents and the other 100 cents, though both are called dollars, and as we have been using for fifty years the kind which is worth 100 cents to the dollar, wherein is the benefit to the people from the proposed change? Why not keep the gold, as we have it here?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. HEMPHILL. I think I had better go on.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I will not use the gentleman's time unless he is willing to yield.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I should be perfectly willing to yield, but for the reason that it takes up so much time and does injustice to gentlemen who are to follow me.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I understand that. I am perfectly satisfied.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will my colleague allow me to state more fully what I meant by the question I asked him a while ago?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. Measured by the gold standard of value, it is estimated that the gold dollar is worth about $1.25 as compared with the silver dollar, putting that at 100 cents. The gold dollar therefore is regarded by some to-day as more valuable and it is commercially more valuable than the silver dollar. The silver dollar, again, is much more valuable than the greenback or than the national-bank bill; and yet the greenback, or the national-bank bill, or the silver dollar, or the gold dollar, either one of them will equally pay a debt or a tax. If that be so, how does Gresham's law operate upon either of the four, as long as either of them is a dollar with which a debt or a tax can be paid?

Mr. HEMPHILL. In answer to that, I would say that the greenback and the national-bank note do not pretend to be real money. No man accepts them under the impression that they are real money, because they bear stamped on their faces the promise of the Government to pay real money in the future. Therefore, a man who takes a national-bank note or a greenback does not take it relying upon its inherent value; he relies upon the credit of the Government. But the man who takes a gold or a silver coin stamped by the Government as a dollar has a right to rely upon the honesty of the Government, and to expect that the coin which is thus stamped by the Government as a dollar is worth 100 cents, and if it is not, he is fooled as many wise men have been. Therefore, I say, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER], who agrees with you upon the silver question, admits, that if we continue to push these silver dollars upon the country they will drive out so many gold dollars.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Provided nothing occurs to absorb the extra coinage. But if population increases at such a rate as to call for fifty millions additional money, then those fifty millions will not drive out any gold.

Mr. HEMPHILL. That is a matter about which there is a difference of opinion.

The history of gold and silver money in this country proves the existence and effect of this great principle.

From 1792 to 1834 the ratio of the two metals established by law in the United States was 15 ounces of silver to 1 of gold, whereas the world's ratio was 15½ of silver to 1 of gold. That is, the value of the silver in our coin being comparatively less than in any other country drove gold out of circulation and we were on a single silver basis all these years.

In 1834 Congress undertook to readjust the ratio between the two metals and fixed it at 16 to 1, the world's standard in the mean time continuing at 15½ to 1. The result of this change was that gold coin became comparatively less valuable here than elsewhere and drove silver out of the country, and we have been since that time on a single gold basis.

These changes in the influx and efflux of the two metals were effected by a statute relating simply to their nominal value. How much more certainly must the same result follow from the laws of finance operating upon their real value.

That this has been the experience of the country is admitted by gentlemen on the other side. A distinguished Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS], in a speech on this subject recently, said that—

> From 1792 to 1834 we had a silver period; from 1834 to 1853 and from 1853 to 1873 we had a gold period, and it was for this reason that in 1834 the fineness of the gold dollar was changed, and in 1853 the fineness of the subsidiary coin was changed, so that its debasement amounted to nearly 6 per cent.

And the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS], who now pleads so eloquently for the double standard, beside other similar admissions was led to state in his recent speech on this floor that—

> The fact is we have never been a double-standard country, much as it has been talked about on this floor and elsewhere. The United States has been a single-standard country, but laboring all the time under the delusion that it was a double-standard country.

Whether the people of the United States have been under a "delusion" I am unable to say; but this is certain, they have been prosperous and happy in the past; they have made great strides in the development of the wonderful resources of this magnificent country, so that the extent of their business is now almost beyond computation, and this has been accomplished confessedly under the single standard of value. There can be neither justification nor excuse for forcing on the country a monetary policy directly in the teeth of all our past history, and which, in the opinion of many of the most prudent men of the land, threatens to unsettle values, disarrange business, and stop the wheels of progress, simply for the purpose of maintaining a financial "delusion" among the people, whom we are under the most solemn obligations to serve honestly and openly.

Those of our citizens whose memories go back for twenty-five years, to the war period, need no further reference to history for proof that gold will soon disappear when a cheaper currency is forced into circulation, and that instead of serving the people as currency it will become an article of merchandise to be manipulated by the gamblers of Wall street.

Now, while I would be glad to see the two kinds of coin floating together at par in their proper spheres and ratio, and will support any measure that will produce that result, still if we must have the gold or silver alone, in the future as in the past, I prefer the former—

First. Because according to the estimates there is in the world $3,780,000,000 of silver money, $3,220,000,000 of gold coin—being about 54 per cent. of silver as against 46 per cent. of gold; while 769,000,000 people use silver alone as against 93,000,000 that use gold alone. If this money is distributed in any degree according to population, there must necessarily be a much larger proportion per capita among the gold-using people than among those using silver. And if we can have but one metal we should adopt that which will give to us the largest amount per capita to our population.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Where does the gentleman get those figures?

Mr. HEMPHILL. I have taken them from Mr. REAGAN'S speech. I thought the best way to deal with this question was to take up the arguments which the gentlemen who advocate compulsory silver coinage have put off upon us here, and see whether they were really as weighty as they were claimed to be by those who put them forth.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I was only asking the gentleman's authority for the statistics he read.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I understand. I do not suppose that any man who is in favor of forced silver coinage ever makes a mistake, and therefore I have taken these figures from the speech of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN].

Second. In our own country we have over $600,000,000 of gold and only something over $200,000,000 of silver. Estimating our population at 50,000,000 we have $12 of gold per capita as against $4 of silver. We have been confessedly a gold-using country since 1834, and certainly no sufficient reason has yet been assigned for such a change in our policy as will bring us to another standard and reduce our metallic money to one-fourth of its present volume. In such an event what is to become of the great debtor class of the country of whom we have heard so much? Has any plan been yet suggested by which they can make one dollar do the work of four? Gentlemen should pause and reflect on this unless they intend to grind the face of the poor and crush these people to the dust of the earth.

Third. Gold is the standard of value in those nations from which we received 87 per cent. last year of all our imports, and to which we sent more than 92 per cent. of all our exports. The price of cotton, which is the chief export product of all our Southern country, is in a large degree measured by the market in England, and hence it is of supreme consequence to our farming interests that we should not have a different standard of value from that by which our great staple is measured. If our farmers are to be paid for their cotton in silver at a discount of 20 per cent., as compared with gold, the day of their prosperity is, in my opinion, forever gone.

The relative value of silver and gold will be fluctuating in the future as in the past. The cotton-buyer must make an allowance for this and will be very apt to put himself on the safe side; and by the time a deduction is made from the value of the cotton for freight, insurance, storage, sampling, mending, weighing, and for the difference in value between silver here and gold in Liverpool, there will be little or nothing coming to the seller.

And I appeal to the gentlemen who represent Southern constituencies on this floor to consider well before they adopt a policy which bids fair to turn over the great body of the agriculturists of that portion of our country to the tender mercy of speculators and money-sharks.

Fourth. The nations of the earth have been divided according to their monetary standard as follows: Great Britain, Germany, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, and Portugal as gold standard countries; the United States, Colombia, Venezuela, Chili, Uruguay, Paraguay, Greece, Holland, Belgium, France, Switzerland, Italy, Spain, and Japan as bimetallic gold and silver standard countries, and Russia, Austria, Egypt, British India, Mexico, Central America, Ecuador, and Peru as silver-standard countries. A very slight acquaintance with history will suffice to show that in those in which gold is the standard civilization, riches, prosperity, and happiness much more abound among all classes than in those using silver as the standard.

Fifth. Gold is much the most valuable and the most stable of the two metals.

It is said, however, that gold and silver have not parted company. But it can not be denied by any one that gold and silver bullion are daily getting apart in value, and that the silver that was worth 90 cents when the present law was enacted is now worth less than 80, and is continually depreciating. And as it is impossible for any two men standing back to back to walk in different directions and not part company so is it impossible for two metals to continually separate and still keep together. The two men may separate slowly and reluctantly, still if they keep moving they must eventually come to the distance when the eye and voice of the one will no longer reach the other. So these two metals have put distance between them slowly, but with an unvarying step they have grown apart for years, and it is only a question of time when the bonds of the law that now bind the coins of the two will be powerless to longer hold them together.

If that day ever comes, then the cheaper money must become the money of account and the standard by which all values shall be determined; the prices of all property of every kind, that have been for over fifty years gauged by one standard, must be adjusted to the new one; the products of the farm, factory, and shop must be sold upon a different basis; the wages of labor must be arranged by a different measure and the business of the country adjusted to the new prices. In the midst of this confusion legitimate business will stand still, for prudent men will not risk their means when no calculation can forecast the results. The shrinkage of values that will follow, the depression of business that will ensue, and the suffering of the poor, whose daily employment must supply their recurring wants, will be fearful to contemplate.

A great deal has been said in this discussion in denunciation of the stock-jobbers of Wall street; but let it be remembered that if there is one thing that these people long for and delight in more than another it is in a fluctuating and uncertain market. If it does not exist naturally they endeavor to make it by creating "corners" and other like operations. It should also not be forgotten that the immense fortunes in this country gathered into the hands of a few people, and which rise up in such threatening proportions, were made almost without exception during and subsequent to the war, when gold was at a premium and the business of the country was conducted on a cheap and fluctuating basis of value. That was the heyday of millionaires, and nothing will contribute more to the same baneful result than for Congress to afford them the same opportunities.

Some persons are bold enough to claim that silver is not depreciating, and strenuous effort is made by figures of arithmetic and figures of rhetoric to prove that this is so.

It seems to me that this question can be readily settled so far as this country is concerned. The act of Congress of February 12, 1873, declares that the gold dollar shall be the "unit of value" for the United States. This was a deliberate settlement of the "unit of value," by which, as a standard, the ratio of all other money should be determined. Measured by this standard, the silver dollar is only four-fifths of the value of the unit dollar, although it is stamped as if it were a real dollar. Now, it is conceded on all sides that the silver in a silver dollar was formerly worth as much as the gold in a gold dollar, and that now it sells for 20 per cent. less. To hold that this is not a depreciation from the universal standard fixed for the United States is a palpable and manifest error.

No one would be bold enough to contend that when the bushel is fixed upon as the unit of quantity or the yard-stick as the unit of length that 3 pecks should be forced on people as a full bushel or 30 inches as a good yard; and yet that is just as reasonable and as honest as to say that 80 cents is a full dollar.

A distinguished citizen of this country and a strong friend and supporter of silver recently said in a letter to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] that—

It is not fair or reasonable to insist that 412½ grains of silver shall make a legal-tender dollar when, for the reasons above stated, its intrinsic value is far less than the gold dollar, the unit of value which we ourselves have established.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Will the gentleman allow me a question at this point?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Has not the demonetization of silver gradually augmented the value of gold?

Mr. HEMPHILL. That may possibly be one of the results, but I do not think the——

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Then the gold standard is not the same standard or measure that it was ten years ago; it has itself been altered by the demonetization of silver.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. By legislation.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. By legislation.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Well, if we mean to act honestly we ought to repeal the statute or else have the money conform to it—one thing or the other.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I quite agree with the gentleman.

Mr. HEMPHILL. As long as we have this unit of value it is unfair to force people to take something which is not equal to that unit.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I quite agree with the gentleman. But when he said a while ago that that act was deliberately passed, did he weigh the word "deliberately?"

Mr. HEMPHILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Does not the gentleman know that there were not probably fifty persons, out of the whole population of the United States, who knew that that act was being passed?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Does not the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] know that this matter was called attention to in the report of the Comptroller of the Currency three times, and that the bill was submitted to over thirty gentlemen in different parts of the United States, and does he not know that it was reported upon by a committee of the Senate, and that 500 extra copies were printed for the Treasury Department for distribution throughout the country? Does he not know that it was printed thirteen times by order of Congress, was here at five different sessions; and does he not know that two gentlemen referred to these facts in speeches upon this floor?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I do not.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Well, if you do not you had better go and find out the facts.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I know that the facts are not as the gentleman states them. The fact is that while a certain bill was printed, this provision of the law came in in a conference report, and hardly anybody heard of it until it became a law, and the President who approved the bill did not know that this provision was in it, as he afterward stated.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Well, the people at large can not be held responsible for the stupidity or the ignorance of the President of the United States, whoever he was at that time—I do not remember.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. General Grant was President.

Mr. HEMPHILL. This thing is certain, that the people are not to be held responsible for the negligence or the ignorance of their representatives, except as they may be responsible for sending Representatives here who did not understand their business. This measure was for a long time in this House, it was put in print and was spoken of upon the floor of the House, and if people will not look and see what is before them, I do not know that others should be blamed for that.

I continue the quotation from this silver man:

* * * If the silver men are not blind they must see that, measured by our own "unit of value," 412½ grains of silver are worth much less than they were twenty years ago, and that it is gross injustice to attempt to force the depreciated dollar into the currency.

But silver has not only declined here as compared with our unit of value; it has depreciated in all the markets of the world.

The following table, prepared by the Director of the Mint, shows the ratio of silver to gold each year since 1687:

In these three hundred years silver has fallen greatly in price as compared with gold. In 1687 it required 14.94 ounces of silver to buy one of gold, whereas now it takes 19.41 ounces to pay for the same thing; i. e., it requires about one-third more silver than in the first-named year.

The decline in the value of silver has been attributed to many causes. The most potent of these probably, in its immediate effect, is that Germany, France, and other nations lately associated with France, have ceased to coin it.

In this country, however, nothing has contributed more to its decline than the extreme efforts that are here made to put it into circulation by force.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. But I thought that "Gresham's law" circulated the cheaper metal; that it was the cheaper metal that went without pushing.

Mr. HEMPHILL. "Gresham's law" is like all other laws—like the law of gravitation——

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Subject to exceptions?

Mr. HEMPHILL. No; not subject to exceptions; but there are many things that come into operation upon a question of this character; and it is a great mistake to say that any man can fix a date when "Gresham's law" will come into operation.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Is it not in operation all the time?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Yes; it is in operation all the time; but when it will show its effects is another thing. I will ask the gentleman why this silver money does not get into circulation throughout the country. Will the gentleman answer?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I am glad of an opportunity to answer.

Mr. HEMPHILL. If the gentleman can answer I shall be glad to hear him.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It is just the opportunity I want. The silver money and all the other money in the Treasury—$200,000,000 in excess of the demand liabilities of the Government—is there as surplus revenue gathered from taxes. It can only go out by appropriations of Congress or by payments on the public debt. If the gentleman from South Carolina would bring here all the wealth of his State he could not get $100 out of the Treasury for it.

Mr. HEMPHILL. That is very true.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. That is why it does not circulate. It is collected there by taxation, and locked in. Your Treasurer can not pay it out. "Gresham's law" can not haul it out.

Mr. HEMPHILL. We will see after a while whether the Treasury Department has not used every effort to put it out, and whether it is not the fact that the people will not take it. I think I shall be able to show that the people return this silver just as fast as it is put out.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. One hundred and seventy-four million dollars of debt are now due. The payment of the debt will take it all, and much more.

Mr. HEMPHILL. The history of mankind does not show that good money requires any power behind it; it goes on its own merits; and when business men hear the Representatives on this floor so earnest in their efforts to push this silver they become suspicious and reluctant, and begin to inquire if the white metal is really as good as the yellow, as is pretended. Such inquiry is apt to be fatal to the acceptance of the silver.

It is contended, however, that the silver dollar still passes as such at its nominal value, although its real value is much less. This is true, and it has deceived many people, and therein lies an element of the grossest injustice to the citizen. Whatever be the nominal or law-given value of coin over its intrinsic value is pure inflation. It is to that extent "fiat money." The legal value of our silver dollar is maintained for the time above its real value by the act making it a legal tender; so that one-fifth of its value rests solely upon the act of Congress, and the only assurance the citizen has that this fictitious value will continue even for a time is the faint hope that Congress will continue of the same mind on this special point that it was in 1878, but of a totally different mind from what it was in 1873. So that if Congress shall at any time withdraw the legal-tender function of the silver dollars they will at once fall to their real value, and every citizen of the Republic owning silver coin would find that in the twinkling of an eye his money had fallen 20 cents on the dollar, and what was one day worth 100 cents would the next be worth only 80.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. That is prophecy.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Has such a thing ever happened?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. No.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. It has not happened; and you can not prove it.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Let us see. The trade-dollar was by the act of 1873 made a coin of the United States and a legal tender for any sum not exceeding $5. From 1873 to 1878 it was the only silver dollar coined at our mints. In 1876, when $15,400,000 had gotten out and into the pockets of the people, Congress deprived them of their legal-tender quality, the Treasury refused to receive them, and they are worth now in consequence only about 85 cents on the dollar. I ask whether that is not the proof?

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. That is demonetization.

Mr. HEMPHILL. That may be demonetization; but it is taking away the legal-tender function.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. HEMPHILL. If you restore the legal-tender function of the trade-dollar it will command as good a price as the standard silver dollar.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. And if you demonetize gold where will it go?

Mr. HEMPHILL. We are talking about silver. I say, so far as that is concerned, you can get 100 cents for your gold dollar in Liverpool to-day.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsyvania. But suppose all the commercial nations of the world should treat gold as silver has been treated, does the gentleman presume to say that silver would remain down and gold would continue to be where it is?

Mr. HEMPHILL. That is the point exactly. We are trying to run this country on a silver basis as if we were the only nation on earth, as if we could manage this financial question all our own way. Gentlemen say that if other countries would do with gold what has been done with silver, gold would go down. That may be true; and it is the fact that the action of other countries does affect the value of these metals that makes it so important for us to act in concert with them instead of trying to control the price by our solitary action.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman who preceded you [Mr. JAMES] showed that other nations—Germany and England—were already moving in the direction of remonetizing silver on account of the present status of this question.

Mr. HEMPHILL. England is very late coming to that conclusion. She has been about eighty years finding out the proper policy on this question. And there are some pretty smart people in England.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. And some people worship England more than they do America.

Mr. HEMPHILL. That applies, I suppose, to those who change their minds on this subject—who used to be for gold and are now for silver.

In 1873 Congress refused to recognize the standard silver dollar as one of the coins of the United States, although it had been such for eighty years, and in 1874, with $8,000,000 coined, deprived it of its legal-tender quality. In 1878 it began to coin it again, putting in 90 cents' worth of silver, and to-day it puts in less than 80 cents to the dollar. This is now a legal tender and is received at the Treasury. The Government, then, is in this very peculiar and anomalous condition of receiving at its Treasury one of its dollars containing 412½ grains of silver, and repudiating another containing 420 grains of the very same metal. It multiplies its inferior coin at the rate of twenty-four millions annually, while it refuses to recognize its better money already coined. And it has been stated, how truly I am unable to say, that the Government has at one time or another, in the past thirty years, repudiated every coin of its issue from the copper cent to the double eagle.

In view of such varying and illogical conduct on the part of the Government and the loss thereby of millions already sustained by our citizens, is it any wonder that the people are slow in taking these dollars when they realize that one-fifth of their value rests wholly upon the action of Congress? And those of us who desire to see the country enjoying an honest and stable currency can not be blamed if we insist that the people shall be provided with a coin that is really what it pretends to be, and that depends for its value upon the metal that is in it, and not on the varying notions of an ever-changing Congress.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The gentleman has been so kind in yielding to interruptions that I can not resist the temptation to ask another question.

Mr. LONG. Then the gentleman's time ought to be extended.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. We will do that. The gentleman says that one reason why the people do not accept the silver circulation is because 20 per cent. of the value of a silver dollar is the result of legal tender and because the people have doubts whether it will remain permanently at the present figure. Now, I ask, do the people hesitate to take greenbacks, the entire value of which depends, according to the gentleman's theory, upon their legal-tender quality? If they hesitate to take silver because 20 per cent. of its value is dependent on legal tender, why do they not hesitate still more to take the greenbacks, the whole value of which rests on that basis.

Mr. HEMPHILL. The greenback has the promise of the Government behind it. A man can take a greenback to the Treasury and get gold dollars for it.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. But the promise of the Government is to pay in these very silver dollars.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. There is no promise of the Government to pay the greenbacks in gold.

Mr. HEMPHILL. If you put behind the greenbacks a dollar which is not worth more intrinsically than the greenbacks, the people will refuse to receive them, and very properly.

This question has been discussed by some gentlemen as if money was only a measure of value, as the yard-stick is the measure of length. But this is a misleading statement of the true characteristics of money. Real money, in addition to being the measure of wealth, is itself wealth, and the citizen who has $1,000 in good money is as rich as one who has $1,000 of any other property. It is not enough to say of money that it will pay debts by force of the United States statutes. We ought to be able to affirm that its true value is the same as that at which the citizen is compelled to accept it. Anything less than this is not honest.

Many thrifty and economical people in this country, far removed from banks and centers of trade, annually lay aside from their hard earnings some gold and silver coin against the day when they shall be no longer able to earn their living. It is but fair that they should know that the silver coin bearing the Government stamp, and which they have stored away, is not really worth what they were compelled to accept it at, and that they are liable at any time to see their dearly-bought savings melting away before their eyes like the snow before the summer's sun.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. But under "Gresham's law" silver is the money that ought to circulate.

Mr. HEMPHILL. That is the only law under which it ought to circulate; it ought not to circulate under any law of the United States.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. But the gentleman says it does not circulate, and still insists that the "Gresham law" is in force.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] does not controvert the proposition I am about to state, and I do not know anybody who does. If the value of the silver dollar is to be measured by the gold dollar we concede that it is not as valuable as the gold dollar; but we claim that the gold dollar is not the proper measure.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I can not quite agree to that. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEMPHILL. The gentleman from Ohio does not agree with the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Yes, he does agree with me that gold is not the proper measure of the value of the silver dollar.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Certainly; that is right. I agree with the gentleman so far.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. That is all that I said.

Mr. HEMPHILL. What is the measure?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. The measure is that which the Constitution provides. The Constitution of the United States says that Congress shall have power "to coin money and regulate the value thereof." It must be regulated by law, not by the bullion market.

Mr. LONG. The law says that gold is the unit of value.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. The law said that before the Bland dollar was coined. When the Bland act was passed it virtually provided that gold and silver should be the unit of value.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The unit of value is not the same thing as the standard of value.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. No.

Mr. HEMPHILL. One thing is true: whenever you fix a unit, that is a measure.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Not necessarily a measure.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Certainly. What is a half-dollar but half the unit? What are two dollars but double the unit?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The unit might have been made, as Robert Morris suggested, the cent, the one-hundredth part of a dollar. In the foundation of our Mint and our coinage system it was seriously contemplated to make the unit a cent instead of a dollar. A unit is the single thing in a monetary system. The value of silver, let me say, is what it will buy.

Mr. BYNUM. I insist that the gentleman from South Carolina shall be permitted to proceed without further interruption.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I will do so, if gentlemen will permit.

I can conceive of no harder fate than that these good people should be deceived by their own Government, and in their old age, instead of enjoying the means which they so frugally gathered up, they should find themselves turned adrift upon the cold charity of this world to eat the bitter bread of dependence. We have now before this House a petition signed by the representatives of over a million laboring people, praying this Congress to save them and their fellows from this cruel fate.

Honest money for honest people is all we ask, and it is what the public has the right to demand.

No doubt those of our countrymen, good and true men, who entertain this view will be greatly astounded to know that they are denounced here as greedy, avaricious gold monometallists—money-sharks and conspirators, not only against their own countrymen but against the whole human race. But it is pleasant to note that there are a number of Representatives upon this floor who are willing to advocate this great principle of honesty in money notwithstanding the bitterness of the invective and denunciation by the gentlemen upon the other side.

It appears from the official sources that from July 1, 1878, to June 30, 1885, we coined over two hundred million standard silver dollars, and that the profit to the Government was over $25,000,000. When we remember that the Government is supposed to be doing this for the benefit of the people, and that the actual expense of coining is only 1½ cents per dollar, it does seem that there must be something radically wrong and rotten in a financial system by which the Government makes a clear profit of $1 in every $8 for simply stamping the bullion.

It is said, however, that this profit is not lost, but goes into the public Treasury. That is true, and the enormous amounts that go into the public Treasury is one of the stupendous evils of this day. The riches of a nation should be in the pockets of its people, and not in the treasury of its government. And it is peculiarly hard upon our people to pay as much as they do in taxes into an overflowing Treasury and then have the Government make a net gain of many millions for simply coining their money.

The clear profit of coining a million legal silver dollars at the present price of silver bullion is $200,000. Does any man believe that with such a reward at stake men will be able to resist the temptation of illegal and counterfeit coinage? Even if the United States has no citizens to engage in this enterprise Canada and other adjoining countries can furnish them, and no doubt this country is already bountifully supplied with this unwarranted coin.

Have the judgment and predictions of the gentlemen who first advocated and passed the present law and who still ask the country to follow their lead been verified in experience? They prophesied eight years ago with great earnestness, with great fallacy, but no doubt with equal honesty, that silver would soon equal gold in value, and, in fact, would exceed it. But the 90 cents in the dollar, instead of becoming 100, has fallen to 80. What a satire upon the financial wisdom of these gentlemen!

The present law as a scheme for furnishing a sure and reliable market for the sellers of silver bullion has been quite a success; but as a plan for the restoration of silver to an equality in value with gold, it must stand out as one of the magnificent failures of this age.

It seems, according to the view of the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS], the past and present devoted advocate of the Bland act, that notwithstanding our efforts to restore and maintain the bullion price of silver we find ourselves to-day in a more pitiable condition in that respect than any nation on earth. This is his melancholy confession:

> Why, silver is dearer in Europe than it is here. Every kind of silver is higher in Europe, higher in India, higher in every country on the earth than it is here, whether it is coined silver or manufactured silver or bullion silver.

So that we are in the humiliating position of having followed for eight years a financial policy under the leadership of these gentlemen that is worse than vain.

A very strenuous and persistent effort has been made to give out the impression that all those who do not favor the further compulsory coinage of silver are gold monometallists and working for that metal only. The truth is, that many of the most distinguished advocates of silver are earnestly favoring the suspension of the present coinage.

Mr. Cernuschi, an able friend of bimetallism and the author of a number of works on this subject, concludes a recent treatise as follows:

> So long as the bimetallic treaty proposed in 1881 by the United States and France is not accepted either by England or by Germany, not one silver 5-franc piece should be coined in France, not one silver dollar should be coined in the United States. In no form, under no pretext, should silver currency be increased, neither in France nor in the United States.

Mr. S. Dana Horton, one of the ablest and the most extensive writers on this subject, a strong bimetallist and a delegate from this country to both the international conferences in Paris in 1878 and 1881 to establish a bimetallic union, favors the suspension of the present coinage and says that the chief obstructionists to an international agreement are these men who insist upon the continuance of the present law.

Mr. Walker, consul-general of the United States at Paris, who attended a meeting of the delegates of the Latin Union in 1885, is of the same opinion; and even the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] admits "that the present situation is not satisfactory, is not logical or consistent with sound monetary principles."

It must be apparent to any one who will view the question without prejudice that as long as the United States will continue to coin silver, and run all the risk of financial disaster by attempting to float two metals of different values, other nations will very willingly let us do it. If we will take care of the cheaper and depreciating metal they will content themselves with the better one. And every day we continue alone this coinage we postpone by that much the chances of an international agreement by which alone can we ever hope to swing the par of the metals and maintain them at a fixed and permanent ratio.

The second plan proposed for the remedy of the evils we are now suffering from is that of free coinage of silver to all comers. It ought to be a sufficient answer to this proposition to say:

First. Bimetallism in the sense of free coinage of both metals is no longer of force in any country of the world.

Second. If silver coinage be made free, then any and every person in any part of the world having 80 cents' worth of silver could have it coined into a dollar which our citizens would be compelled to accept at its full nominal value, but which would be taken only at 80 cents in any other country on the globe.

Here it would pass at its nominal value, anywhere else at its real value. Are we prepared to turn our citizens over to the speculators and gamblers of every nation on earth?

Mr. Horton, above quoted, expressly warns us against such a plan. He says:

> The task for European monetary diplomacy was, how to maneuver the United States out of its adhesion to the policy of bimetallic union, and into the scheme of coining silver without limit all alone.

Such a policy would, in my opinion, bring us with greater rapidity than even the present law to silver monometallism, and while this is the manifest and logical result of the plan in such high repute among some gentlemen on this floor, it would be so clearly unjust and detrimental that it has not yet found one acknowledged advocate.

No one has pretended to claim that in India or Mexico, or in any other portion of the world where silver coinage is absolutely free and open, the bullion is now or has been for a number of years on a par with gold. They give us no reasons to believe such a result will be produced here; and when we remember that the price of silver is confessedly affected by the action of foreign countries which our legislation can not control, it must be manifest that we can not singly and alone hope to control the silver market. Considering the millions of people interested and the immense business to be affected, we can not afford to undertake free coinage now without some data to base a judgment upon, relying simply upon the prophetic vision of some sanguine spirits, whose predictions in the past have not tended to inspire us with confidence in their present efforts.

Third. If the compulsory coinage be dangerous, and the free and unlimited coinage still more perilous, it would seem the dictate of sound sense to adopt some other policy.

A bill is now pending in this House which provides that the Government shall keep in its vaults a reserve of 20,000,000 silver dollars, and if at any time the requirements of trade or the wants of the people reduce this amount, then the Secretary of the Treasury shall purchase bullion and coin a sum sufficient to replace the amount drawn out. In this way the Treasury would serve as a great reservoir from which this money could be drawn by any of the legitimate demands of business, and it would seem that it ought to be satisfactory to any reasonable man on the other side. It would avoid the compulsory features of the present law, and would practically test the vexed question as to whether or not the people really prefer silver money to gold or paper. If they do, as many contend, this will create a demand for silver bullion in our own markets which will increase its price and tend to bring it nearer to an equality with gold. By this means we may possibly reach the day when our silver dollar will be inwardly what it is outwardly, and when it will go from hand to hand on its own merits, not relying any longer upon the compelling force of a United States statute.

Fourth. If the above plan be not acceptable, then we should either suspend now or at a future day, say one or two years hence, and provide for the appointment of a commission of able financiers and diplomats, who in the mean time should endeavor to secure the agreement of other nations to coin silver with us on a fixed ratio. With such an arrangement we could probably control the price of silver bullion, and thus be able to continue its coinage without danger. This plan I know has the approval of some of the ablest friends of silver and bimetallism, men of unquestioned ability and character, true friends of silver and the best interests of the country, who realize that the present headstrong course of coining silver at a ratio not now nor heretofore used by any other nation on earth is only putting an insurmountable obstacle in the way of the final and satisfactory solution of this problem.

A great deal has been said by the gentlemen on the other side, in the treatment of this question, who modestly assume to be the only representatives of the people on this floor, about the rich man and the poor man, claiming that gold is the money of the former and silver of the latter.

It is exceedingly unfortunate that there should be a tendency to divide our people along the line of wealth, and thus create a prejudice of one class against another. A far better way to judge a man is by the size of his soul and not by the size of his pocket. If he is an honest, patriotic, and upright citizen he is just as much a man whether he has one dollar or many. I can see no reason why a poor man should be paid in a different dollar from his rich neighbor. Wherein lies the justice of paying one class of our citizens in a dollar, the gold in which is worth 100 cents in every part of the world, and another set in another dollar, the silver in which is worth only 80 cents, but which they are compelled to accept by force of their own laws?

I wonder that any man is found bold enough to advocate such a nefarious doctrine.

There seem to be some men, however, in this world so excessively and exuberantly fond of the poor man that they are willing to make him poor and keep him poor just that they may have the pleasure of gushing over him and talking about him in public. But they never go any farther. If he etxends his penniless hand in want they drop into it a tear or a few well-turned sentences of unalloyed demagogism of standard weight and fineness, and with these they expect to satisfy his wants. [Applause.]

If we take some of the speeches we have heard from the other side about the poor man and strip them of their eloquence, rhetoric, declamation, and denunciation, whatever may be the intention their policy is to pay the toiling millions of this country for an honest day's labor in a dishonest dollar. And the cold winds of winter are not more chilling or more unkind than are these men who would treat these poor people in this cruel manner under the flimsy pretext of doing them a kindness.

I believe if the great body of the people of the country apprehended the facts connected with this issue and understood what was being done in their name they would repudiate the whole thing as a sham and a humbug.

The poor people of this country are entitled to as good a dollar as anybody, and if my vote will help to give it to them they shall certainly have it. As it is now, what costs the Government 80 cents costs them 100, and yet that is called honest.

The people at large, so far as I can see, desire an honest and stable currency, and in an amount sufficient for the legitimate business of the land. There is no reason for saying that they prefer silver to any other money; in fact the figures show that they do not. Let us see.

From 1792 to 1873 there was absolute free coinage at the United States mints for silver bullion to all comers, and yet in that long period there was only coined eight million silver dollars; that is to say, $100,000 a year under free coinage as against twenty-four million a year under the present forced coinage. Is it not strange that during that three-fourths of a century when we were getting the merest pittance of silver dollars that no cry came up from the people demanding more? The truth is that during the greatest portion of that period the owners of silver bullion could ship it to France and other European nations, and have it coined at a profit of 3 per cent. over coining it here, and so long as that continued we were left to take care of ourselves. But when the mints of European countries were closed against silver, and it began to depreciate in price at once, and so suddenly, a great hue and cry starts up that the people are demanding the coinage of silver dollars. And some of our friends on the other side have presented to our astonished vision a beautiful picture of the "silver king" and the poor man marching arm in arm on the high road to prosperity. It is a splendid exhibition in fancy of that fraternal affection that we all long to see existing between the different classes of citizens, but when stripped of its rhetorical surroundings and adornments it only means that one man has 80 cents' worth of silver that he wants to palm off on the other for a dollar. [Applause.]

In order to get this silver money out of the Treasury and into circulation the Government has paid and continues to pay the charges of transportation from the mints or Treasury to any part of the United States. It does not pay such expenses on any other money.

From the last report of the Treasurer it appears that the amount of silver dollars shipped from the mints to various points to June 30, 1885, was $96,000,000, of which there only remained outstanding on that date $38,000,000, and that the cost to the Government of moving these coins was $430,313.76, and that the holders paid more to get it back into the Treasury than the Government did to get it out among them. That can hardly be called a much-desired coin when the people will pay more to return it to the vaults from whence it came than it costs the Government to get it out.

Last year the amount of this money coined was $28,528,552, and of this sum the Treasurer succeeded in issuing $16,627,691, at a cost to the Government of $62,985.40; but there was returned to the Treasury in the same time $17,824,625, so that the result of the year's operations was that the people had returned to the Government $1,196,934 more than they had taken, and it had cost the Treasury over $62,000 to accomplish it. The Secretary of the Treasury in his recent letter says:

I have labored to promote the circulation of silver with unremitting energy. I have pressed its circulation at a constant expense to the Treasury when other forms of lawful money could have been circulated without such cost. I have pressed its circulation at the expense of the United States notes (ones and twos), which, as fast as redeemed, have been reissued only in larger denominations. I have pressed its circulation at the expense of the circulation of national-bank notes. I have upheld its value by never compelling its receipt by any creditor of the Government, and never failing to provide by exchange or transfers whatever currency might be preferred.

But, notwithstanding these strenuous efforts and this heavy expense, the total amount of silver in actual circulation is only 18.8 per cent. of the total coinage, and there is over $79,000,000 in the Treasury to-day neither in circulation nor represented by certificates.

Now, see the absurdity of the claim that the people prefer the silver dollar to any other, when the Government pays the expense of shipping it to them and yet there remains over $79,000,000 in the Treasury that nobody calls for.

Some of the speakers have argued that, owing to the scarcity of gold, as they contend, it was necessary to coin the silver even at its present market value, in order to supply the country with a sufficient circulating medium.

But is it a fact that gold is becoming scarce? In a recent article on this subject by one of the most distinguished students and statisticians of this country it is estimated that the amount of gold in use per capita of the world's population is $3. That taking the increase of population at fourteen millions per annum, and the gold product for the year at $95,000,000, he finds that $7.50 is the gold increase in a single year per capita of the increase of population. That is, gold dollars have increased two and a half times as fast as the population, and the gold product of the mines for 1884-'85 would supply each person born into the world in that time with as much gold as the average above stated and leave a surplus of $43,000,000 to go into the arts.

Has it decreased in this country? Let the following table, furnished by the Director of the Mint, and accepted and used by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN], answer this question.

Statement showing the estimated amount of gold and silver coin and bullion in the United States on the 1st of January each year from 1878 to 1885 inclusive.

1880	327,000,000	61,634,318	388,634,318

* In mints and New York assay office.

This shows that we had on January 1, 1885, nearly three times as much gold as we had seven years prior to that, and sets at rest all theories as to gold growing scarce in this country.

It is said, however, that we are endeavoring to demonetize one-half the debt-paying money of the world and to reduce by one-half the value of all the property in the universe. This is certainly a sweeping and a grave charge.

But let us examine the facts. Silver constitutes 54 per cent. of the metallic money of the world; it is used to the exclusion of gold by seven hundred and sixty-nine millions of people, and in conjunction with gold by one hundred and eighty-seven millions more; it is not proposed by any one to deprive the silver already coined of its full monetary use; the total annual output of the silver mines of the United States, of which we only coin one-half, is comparatively so small that it would not pay for one-half the hen eggs yearly consumed by our own people; and the laws of this Congress on silver coinage or anything else do not operate beyond the limits of our own country. In view of these simple and undeniable facts is it not absolutely absurd to accuse any one of seeking to demonetize one-half the metallic money of the whole universe simply because it is proposed to stop coining silver until some plan can be devised to maintain its value? Is it to be expected that the hundreds of millions of population in India, Russia, Mexico, and other countries in which silver is the only metallic money in use, who are thousands of miles away from us, are to surrender their only coin because of any act of this Congress? Some gentlemen appear to have an abnormally developed conception of the powers of this body; but while they may be and are great, they do not extend beyond the ability to save or ruin our own financial and commercial affairs.

There is not the faintest ground to suppose that silver will cease to be used as money; for if we should never again coin an ounce of it there are many nations on the earth, with a population ten times as great as ours, using silver alone, who will gladly purchase the entire products of the mines at its full market value and change it into coin for their own use.

Does not the other proposition, that this is a plan by the rich moneylenders to reduce the property of all the world by one-half of its value and double the value of gold and by this means oppress the poor, appear equally untenable? The poor are not one-tenth part as much interested in maintaining the value of property as the rich. Look for a moment at the hundreds of millions of dollars invested in real estate in our great cities, in the long lines of railways, steamship companies, coal mines, iron mines, and manufacturing establishments. Do these belong to the poor? If not, what earthly reason can be assigned for the rich working to reduce all this property to one-half its value? Under this theory we would expect to find the stockholders of a great railroad heavily burdened with outstanding bonds and mortgages, as all of them are, deliberately devising a plan to reduce the value of their property one-half and doubling the time and labor required to lift the debt under which they are laboring. It is safe to assert that the history of mankind furnishes no example of such extreme folly.

This class of arguments bear their own refutation stamped upon their face. They are nothing but very transparent financial bugaboos, that do not even rise to the dignity of universal contempt.

Let us look for a moment at the prosperous nations of the earth to learn, if we may, something from their experience in this matter. It is a well-known fact that no silver has been coined in Great Britain since 1816; in Germany since 1871, and in France since 1879. Has any man been reckless enough to assert that silver money in these countries has been "struck down" or destroyed; that gold has been doubled in purchasing power or property reduced to one-half its former value. On the contrary, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] has proved most satisfactorily that silver still floats at par with gold and other currency notwithstanding the action of these Governments. He says:

The Director of the Mint, in his annual report now before us, shows on the authority of our foreign ministers that in Great Britain and Ireland, with their $580,500,000 in gold, their $95,000,000 silver, and their $199,160,115 of outstanding bank notes, all are taken in business transactions at par; that in France, with her $848,000,000 of gold, $595,000,000 of silver, and her $574,675,197 of outstanding notes of the Bank of France, the gold and silver and notes of the Bank of France are at par and a legal tender; * * * that in Germany, with her $325,000,000 of gold, $211,000,000 of silver, $33,602,327 in government notes, and $252,655,564 in bank notes, the coin and paper are received indiscriminately at par.

Now, if with the cessation of silver coinage these nations and others that could be named are on such a firm and satisfactory financial basis, why do these gentlemen predict such direful results in this country from following identically the same course?

If we examine a little further into the history and present conditions of the nations we will find that Great Britain is the richest country on earth, and that all others are her debtors. Her commerce covers all the seas, and her flag is unfurled in the ports of all nations. She has long supplied the wants of civilized countries with the handiwork of her well-paid laborers, and is to-day pushing her way into the dark continent to clothe the naked millions of that barbarous land.

How has England achieved this most enviable position? Certainly not by coining silver, for she has not indulged in that for near a century. And while our friends say that England has grown enormously rich on a wrong financial policy, still if we can bring these United States to the same condition as the mother country, have all nations debtors to us, and conduct our entire people to that contentment and happiness that comes with prosperity and wealth, I for one will not disdain to follow her example. That would be indeed a glorious result, worthy of the noblest ambition of statesmen and patriots, and toward the accomplishment of which I would count myself happy in being able to render the slightest aid; for I most desire of all earthly things to contribute something during the years of my active manhood to the true development of this great country and to the amelioration and improvement of the condition of that generous people who have chosen me to this high office, and with whose good name I shall be proud to have mine associated as long as anything said or done by me shall be remembered among the sons of men. [Great applause.]

[During the delivery of Mr. HEMPHILL'S remarks, the hour having expired, the time was continued, by unanimous consent, until he had concluded.]

Mr. BYNUM. Mr. Speaker, I desire to occupy the attention of the House for a time in the discussion of the measure now before it looking to the free coinage of the silver dollar. I do not expect that I shall be able to say anything that will change the opinion of any member of the House; in fact, I doubt if there will be a single change wrought by the entire discussion of the question; and yet I believe that no better use can be made of the time of the House than that which has and will be taken up in the examination of this important matter. It is by this means that the people will become educated upon the subject and be prepared to give a correct and intelligent expression of their views when the proper time arrives for them to speak.

The President and Secretary of the Treasury have strongly recommended the suspension of the coinage of silver dollars. A partisan and supporter of the administration, possessing unlimited confidence in the integrity and patriotism of the Executive and his Secretary, I have and expect, whenever and wherever I consistently can, to support their views and uphold their policies. I am, however, upon this question compelled to dissent from the views expressed by the President in his message and the Secretary in his report. In this discussion I shall try, as I always have done, to be fair, just, and honorable. While I may regret that the President and Secretary entertain the views expressed, I am glad that they have declared them in language that can not be misunderstood or misinterpreted. They have given to those entertaining contrary opinions timely notice and ample opportunity to answer. The opposition to the views of the President and Secretary by members of their own party has no political significance. It is a difference of opinion as to policies and not as to fundamental principles.

Opposition—

It has been well said—

when restrained within due bounds is the salubrious gale that ventilates the opinions of the people, which might otherwise stagnate into the most abject submission. It may be said to purify the atmosphere of politics, to dispel the gross vapors raised by the influences of ministerial artifice until the Constitution, like a mighty rock, stands full disclosed to the view of every individual who dwells within the shade of its protection.

Having signed the report of the minority of the Committee on Coinage, which recommends the passage of the bill making the coinage of silver dollars free and unlimited, occupying advanced ground, I ought to be able to give some plausible reason, whether satisfactory or not, for the position I occupy.

The Bland bill which passed the House on the 5th day of November, 1877, by an overwhelming vote, provided for the free and unlimited coinage of the silver dollar containing 412½ grains, as provided in the act of January 18, 1837. The bill was amended in the Senate so as to require the Government to purchase not less than two million dollars' worth of silver bullion, and to coin not less than two nor more than four million dollars, per month. The friends of silver, in the presence of a hostile administration, were willing to accept the compromise measure. Had the spirit and intention of this law been honestly carried out by the coinage of the maximum limit, or the product of our own mines, it is more than probable that the problem would have been settled before this either by the adoption of free coinage or by suspension. The execution of this law, however, has been in the hands of the enemies of the silver dollar; coinage has been restricted to the minimum limit, and the excess of bullion produced from our mines thrown upon the market as a commodity. The effect of such a policy only tended to further depress the market value of silver bullion.

I am in favor of the free coinage of silver because I believe it to be a palpable and of the rights of the States and the people to in any wise limit or restrict the coinage of either metal. By the articles of confederation the right of coining money belonged concurrently to the States, Congress possessing only the exclusive right to regulate the alloy and value. Can it be inferred that when the States parted with the right to coin money and consented to the restriction upon their powers to make nothing but gold and silver a legal tender they intended that the Federal Government should coin or not coin money as Congress might determine? Did they intend by this concession to become dependent upon the will of legislation, or to continue to rely upon natural resources, which had been the policy of all governments from the foundation of the world, to furnish the supply of money?

Following the adoption of the Constitution, Congress in 1792 adopted the first law upon the subject of coinage. This law authorized the coinage of both gold and siver, and, with slight modifications as to relative proportions, notwithstanding we coined in 1851–'52 $119,460,680 of gold, remained unchanged till 1873, when silver was demonetized. This act may fairly be taken as an interpretation of the provisions of the Constitution. Upon the constitutional powers of the Government Mr. Blaine in 1878 said:

I believe gold and silver coin to be the money of the Constitution, indeed the money of the American people anterior to the Constitution, which the great organic law recognized as quite independent of its own existence. No power was conferred on Congress to declare either metal should not be money. Congress has, therefore, in my judgment no power to demonetize either any more than to demonetize both * * * If therefore silver has been demonetized I am in favor of remonetizing it. If its coinage has been prohibited I am in favor of ordering it to be resumed. If it has been restricted I am in favor of having it enlarged.

The advocates of continued coinage and of free coinage are confronted at the threshold of this discussion with the statement that the further coinage of silver

WILL DRIVE GOLD FROM THE COUNTRY.

This argument, if it may be called an argument, is not new or original. The same objection was made to the enactment of the present law.

Senator Wadleigh, in opposing it, said:

I am in favor of a double standard if it can be maintained, but the passage of this measure will result in driving all the gold from this country and giving us the single standard of silver. The cheaper metal will drive away the dear. Two hundred millions of gold now in the country would, without this pernicious agitation, ere now have crossed the frail barrier of 1½ per cent. which separates it from paper currency and gone into our circulation, to restore hope and confidence and given strength and vigor to all business operations. The success of this measure will drive it to other enlightened and commercial nations and leave to us the debased and bulky money which nearly every progressive nation in Europe has ceased to coin and which supplies the few and degraded wants of the poor and ignorant millions of Russia, China, India, and Mexico.

Senator Matthews said:

It will at the same time expel from circulation and permanently keep out of circulation all gold coinage as effectively as if gold were expressly prohibited by law.

Senator Sargent said:

I object to this bill because it will banish gold from the country. * * * A piece of gold coin will not be seen in use in any part of the country, even in the Pacific States, unless it is held by our specific-contract act, after this bill is in full operation.

Let us briefly examine the facts and see how near these prophecies have been verified. The Comptroller of the Currency in his last report gives the following estimates of gold coin and bullion in the country at the dates fixed:

January, 1879	$278,310,126
November, 1882	547,256,262
November, 1883	581,970,254
November, 1884	585,611,872
November, 1885	586,727,787

The amount of gold coin in the country at the time of the passage of the present law did not exceed $200,000,000. The amount at the present time may fairly be fixed at $600,000,000, showing an increase in our gold coin since the remonetization of silver in 1878 of $400,000,000. From 1873, the time when silver was demonetized, to 1878 when it was remonetized, a period of five years, the exports of gold exceeded the imports by $123,754,210, an average loss of $24,750,842 per year, while from that time in 1878 to the present time, a period of eight years, the imports have exceeded the exports about $200,000,000, an increase of $25,000,000 per annum. Nor is this condition of affairs peculiar to the United States and to be attributed wholly to our great resources, but it is true of other nations, giving to silver the greatest latitude as money.

Mr. Dexter A. Hawkins, of New York, in a very able address before the present Coinage Committee, said:

Germany, in 1873, as soon as she had secured her war indemnity, $1,000,000,000 gold, from France, pursuing the "blood and iron" policy of Bismarck, thought she saw an opportunity to crush France again, financially, as completely as she had already done it on the field of battle by simply discrediting silver. She had emptied France of gold, and now by demonetizing silver she expected to destroy the value of that, which was all the money that was left in France, and so leave her without money except irredeemable bank notes. It was done. The silver of Germany was called in, demonetized, and sold to England in such quantities that in 1876 its price had fallen 20 per cent. The German mints were worked to their full capacity coining the French gold into German marks to supply the place of the demonetized silver. No country ever had so favorable an opportunity as Germany to change from bimetallism to gold. She had reduced the metallic reserve of the Bank of France to $79,000,000, and she held French indemnity obligations falling due that bid fair, she thought, to prevent any gold from accumulating in Paris for many years.

The German gold theorists were in high spirits. But, as afterward in the case of their New York brother, they found that everything went the other way. Silver, which really does the work, being discredited, the German industries from one end of the empire to the other were thrown into confusion; millions of subjects were, from time to time, left in idleness, and it took but a short time for Germany, by beggaring her own industries, to lose more than the thousand millions of gold she had taken from France.

The gold as fast as she coined it disappeared to a great extent from the realm and went back to France. Soon the Bank of France was found to hold $400,000,000 of coin, half of which was gold, and much of this gold the new German coins. Finally, to save herself from ruin, Germany has had to stop the sale of silver, and retain in circulation more than a hundred million dollars of full legal-tender silver, besides as much more of the new coinage not full legal tender. To gold theorists this course of things was all wrong, but to the plain man of affairs all right.

After paying the indemnity, France had her silver left. It was by law full legal tender within the republic, and in fact within the whole Latin Union. It does all the industrial work, carries on the retail trade, keeps up both production and consumption. Frenchmen were all busy; Germans were idle. The foreign demonetization of silver did not affect in the least its domestic value and use as money, and France had $600,000,000 of it. The result is that Germany, with 7,000,000 more population than France, has now of her thousand millions of gold obtained from France, together with her whole domestic stock, only $342,000,000 left, and only $214,000,000 of silver—total, $556,000,000; while France has $900,000,000 of gold and $600,000,000 of silver—total, $1,500,000,000. The possession of full legal-tender silver helped France to recover back in a short time her whole stock of gold.

The Bank of France shows a steady gain in her gold reserve, while that of England and Germany, the gold-mint countries, with great effort remain stationary. Notwithstanding these facts the advocates of suspension of silver coinage are as fruitful as ever with prophecies. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] and the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. FINDLAY] are able to portend with certainty the dreadful consequences that will surely follow if the coinage of silver is not stopped. The prophecies of these gentlemen in the face of the facts are of no value, except that they show that they have been universally wrong, the reverse of what they claim always coming true; and in this manner the House may derive some valuable information and be able, with certainty, to arrive at a correct conclusion. The facts are that gold and silver are the only moneys of consequence in the world. Gold being the more valuable and the easiest transported has become the international money, and is used largely in the settlement of balances of trade, while silver, the less valuable, is more convenient for small transactions and is better adapted to the wants of the people in their dealings with each other.

Silver pays the laborer for his work in the field, in the manufactory, in the shop and in the mine. It purchases his provisions from the grocer, pays his rent and clothes his family. As well said, "It is the people's money." Take away silver and you destroy the industries of the people which furnish the balance of trade in our favor, and our gold will leave us to square the account. Give to American labor plenty of silver and it will furnish products that other nations will purchase and pay for in gold. Gold will not be driven out so long as the balance of trade is in our favor; it will not remain when the balance is against us. Gold is, and ever has been, an unreliable money. The great interests of our people, transacted largely upon confidence and credit, should have a basis neither timid nor cowardly.

If you confine the people of this country to the single standard of gold, periods of depression more lasting and more terrible than we have ever experienced will be our portion. As well said by Senator INGALLS:

No enduring fabric of national prosperity can be builded on gold.

GOLD IS THE MONEY OF MONARCHS.

Kings covet it; the exchanges of nations are effected by it. Its tendency is to accumulate in vast masses in the commercial centers, and to move from kingdom to kingdom in such volumes as to unsettle values and disturb the finances of the world. It is the instrument of gamblers and speculators, and the idol of the miser and thief. Being the object of so much adoration, it becomes haughty and sensitive, and shrinks at the approach of danger, and whenever it is most needed it always disappears. At the slightest alarm it begins to look for refuge. It flies from the nations at war to the nations at peace. War makes it a fugitive. No people in a great emergency ever found a faithful ally in gold. It is the most cowardly and treacherous of all metals. It makes no treaty that it does not break. It has no friend whom it does not sooner or later betray. Armies and navies are not maintained by gold. In time of panic and calamity, shipwreck and disaster, it becomes the chief agent and minister of ruin. No nation ever fought a great war by the aid of gold. On the contrary, in the crisis of greatest peril, it becomes an enemy more potent than the foe in the field; but when the battle is won and peace has been secured gold reappears and claims the fruits of victory.

Driven to cover by the facts, upon the proposition that silver will expel gold, the advocates of suspension say that we have all the silver we can use, all that will circulate upon a par with gold, and that if we coin more the monetary

VALUE OF THE TWO METALS WILL PART.

Of all the sophistries advanced, this is the most fallacious. Will some gentleman tell me what relative uses they perform as money, after being coined by the Government, that will cause them to separate? After being officially stamped as money and given full legal-tender power, what advantage will one possess over the other? When will a silver dollar pay less than its monetary value—when will a gold dollar pay more? The power of sovereignty within the confines of the Government fixes the relative values of the two coins as money, and the values of the materials of which they are made as commodities in the markets can have no influence upon their circulation.

The fiat of the Government gives to one the same qualities as the other, and it is beyond the power of individuals to discriminate except by specific contract. What evidences have these claimants to support their assumptions? Can they furnish any proof in support of their declarations? We have, in round sums, $600,000,000 of gold and $200,000,000 of silver, or three in gold to one in silver. France has $900,000,000 in gold and $600,000,000 in silver, or one and a half in gold to one in silver. Germany, upon a monometallic gold basis, has $340,000,000 of gold and $215,000,000 in silver, being a fraction over one and a half in gold to one in silver. The silver coins of France contain but 15.50 parts, while ours contain 15.98 parts to one of gold.

If France and Germany can maintain at par one dollar of silver to one and a half of gold upon the relations of 15½ to 1, why can we not maintain an equal proportion at the relation of 16 to 1? It is false to pretend that there is any power beyond that of the Government that can fix the relations of the two metals as money. France and Germany fix the relation at 15½ to 1, and the two coins circulate side by side upon an equality. In England $90,000,000 of subsidiary coin circulates upon a par with gold at the relation of $14\frac{2}{10}$ to 1. In our Government $70,000,000 of subsidiary coin, containing but 385⅘ grains to the dollar, circulates upon an equality with the silver dollar containing 412½ grains, and the national banks last year exchanged $5,000,000 of gold coin for this coin in preference to silver dollars. So long as the two coins perform the functions of money they must circulate upon an equality.

Again the advocates of gold approach us with open hands and smiling countenances, but I fear with a dagger concealed beneath their cloaks. "Oh," they say, "we want silver! We are bimetallists, but we WANT AN HONEST DOLLAR.

Suspend coinage and we will drive England, Germany, and other nations to bimetallism, and then the price of silver bullion will appreciate and our dollar will be worth a hundred cents." To the friends of silver I wish to say, "Be not deceived." A suspension of coinage means demonetization. How are we to compel England to adopt bimetallism by throwing into her lap from thirty to fifty millions worth of silver bullion every year to further depress the market and give to her silver so cheap, to develop her cotton and wheat fields in India, that American farmers will be driven from foreign markets and probably compelled to beg for protection at home.

The effect of such a policy was forcibly stated by Mr. Hawkins, as follows:

Its price as bullion will go down 20 per cent. more. England will get it at 60 per cent., instead of paying 100 per cent. She will ship it to her mints in India, where 250,000,000 of people under her rule use only silver for money. She will there coin it at par into rupees and sycee, buy with it from ryots, who work for 8 cents a day, her whole supply of wheat, which she formerly took of us, and land it at Liverpool and London at prices that would bankrupt and starve our American farmers. Her import of wheat from India has in eight years risen 800 per cent., until it is already in amount one-half of the wheat and flour she takes from us.

We should remember that the discriminations made against silver is what has already driven the bullion value of the silver dollar, as compared with gold, down to 80 cents. In 1872 and 1873 Germany, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, and later Holland, demonetized silver. The action of these governments had a double effect—it increased the demand for gold, thereby appreciating its value; it decreased the demand for silver, thereby depreciating its value. At that time the silver in our dollar was above par. The states of the Latin Union, at that time possessing an abundance of silver, were compelled, as a matter of self-protection, to close their mints to this unnatural stream. Our country without silver coin, with an immense debt to pay, every dollar of which, by every principle of law and equity, of honesty and justice, was payable in silver coin, was the desert upon which this current should have been turned. Such a policy would probably have averted the great panic of 1873, which swept across the continent like a besom of destruction marking its course by a destruction of values never before witnessed.

The motives which caused the American Congress to demonetize silver at this period are difficult to fathom. It is said, however, that $500,000 was raised in London and placed in the hands of Mr. Ernest Seyd, of that city, who was sent here as the agent of foreign bondholders and capitalists to accomplish the object. Mr. Seyd, we are informed, made many valuable suggestions to the committee framing the revision of 1873 which were adopted. Silver was demonetized without the consent or the least knowledge upon the part of the people. True, Congress succeeded in partially restoring it to its position, so far as the law was concerned, but in so far as its actual use it has never been remonetized. It has been relegated to the position of a subsidary coinage by every Secretary of the Treasury, and the Government has been kept constantly upon a gold standard and occupies that position to-day.

With all this discrimination against it, silver has held a place in all the governments of the world, performing the functions of a medium of exchange between the great body of the people. It pays the laborer for his wages and purchases the food that feeds and the garments that clothe his family, and does this upon a par with gold. Free coinage will make the silver in a dollar worth a hundred cents. It will do more, it will make wheat and cotton, homes and farms, sweat and muscle, worth a hundred cents to the dollar.

But, Mr. Speaker, I desire to meet, if possible, what is considered by many of the friends of silver as the insurmountable objection to free coinage. No one will controvert the fact that if the free and unlimited coinage of silver will not drive our gold away it is far preferrable to the present law. The great objection urged to free coinage is that the bullion in the silver dollar being purchasable for 80 cents, there would be a profit of 20 cents on the dollar to individuals in taking gold out of the country and bringing in silver, that this profit would expel our gold and place us upon a silver standard. This objection, I confess, is forcible, and if founded in fact is unanswerable.

In the discussion of this proposition there is one question which I have already presented that must be kept clear and distinct in the mind. It is the question which gentlemen upon the other side have persistently befogged and beclouded in this discussion—the difference between the monetary and the bullion value of the silver dollar. Eighty cents' worth of silver bullion can be purchased by our Government to-day, with gold or silver, and coined into a dollar, but the dollar when coined and put in circulation is the equivalent of 100 cents, and it can not be reduced again to bullion without an absolute loss to the holder of 20 cents. The silver coins of all countries circulate upon a par with gold; they have a monetary value equal to gold; to change them from money or coin to buillion would entail an actual loss upon the holders of the difference between their monetary and bullion value.

The coins of France will not be melted down and sold to us at a loss of $130,000,000. Germany has, to the detriment and sorrow of her people, experienced this folly to the extent that she will not try it further. There is, then, no danger of the coins of other governments being sold to us as bullion. But it is said they will be brought here and coined without this sacrifice; that they will simply be converted from French and German coins into American coins and exchanged for our gold. This will not be done. Keeping in mind the fact that these coins circulate upon a par with gold in their respective countries, they can not be converted into an equivalent here, because as compared with our dollar they are worth less than 97 cents. To exchange their silver for gold at our ratio would entail a loss of $25,000,000 upon France and Germany. There is, then, I think, no danger of the coins of Europe coming to us under free coinage.

The only question then is, can we withstand the annual supply of silver? Can we absorb all that which other nations do not need and thereby advance the price of bullion to its monetary value. Whenever the supply of silver is coined into money it will have a money value. No citizen in this or any other country will part with the silver in a dollar for less than a hundred cents when he can have it coined into a hundred cents. The annual production of silver is given by the Director of the Mint at $115,000,000, and he estimates that $35,000,000 is used in ornamentation, manufactures, and the arts, leaving $80,000,000 to be coined into money.

The annual production of gold is estimated at $95,000,000. The lowest estimate of the consumption of this metal in ornamentation, manufactures, and the arts is $75,000,000 per annum, and many statisticians claim that the entire product is thus consumed. It is apparent that as wealth increases the consumption of gold in manufactures and the arts, if not now, will shortly exceed the supply, and the whole world, now striving for trade and commerce, will have to resort to silver to supply the increasing demand.

Table compiled by the silver commission, showing the nations and populations using the double standard, the gold standard, and the silver standard.

DOUBLE-STANDARD COUNTRIES.

	Population.		Population.
Greece	1,400,000	France	36,000,000

Holland	3,700,000

Great Britain	32,000,000	Norway	1,780,000
Canada, Cape of Good Hope, and Australian Colonies	7,000,000	Sweden	4,300,000

Mexico	8,000,000
Central America	2,600,000	Total	768,944,456
Ecuador	1,300,000

It will thus be seen that about 200,000,000 of people use both gold and silver, 100,000,000 gold, while 800,000,000 use silver.

It is claimed, however, that this table is not of value because the people using silver are degraded, poor, and ignorant. Believing that commerce and not population is the better test I have compiled the following table showing the balances of trade (which calls for money) of the different nations given. These balances are taken from the American Almanac, and are chiefly for the years 1883 and 1884:

Gold-standard countries.

These statistics disclose a remarkable state of facts. They show that the balance against the nations using gold was $693,449,217, while the balance against those using the double standard was only $169,433,162, and that the nations using the silver standard had a balance in their favor of $245,281,464. Gentlemen have been pleased again and again to call attention to the fact that the largest part of our trade was with Great Britain. True, but what signifies that when the balance is always largely in our favor? I have in pursuance of this argument compiled, as fully as possible, another table showing the balances of our trade with these different nations for the year 1885:

Gold-standard countries.

IN FAVOR OF THE UNITED STATES.

Great Britain	$161,392,495

Leaving a balance against us of		23,794,236

It will, therefore, be seen that the nations using gold pay us each year about $170,000,000 and the nations using gold and silver about $4,000,000, while we pay to the nations using silver about $25,000,000. We are constantly gaining gold from the gold nations and giving silver to the silver nations and yet the advocates of suspension would have us think that it was our gold instead of our silver that we were in danger of losing. Of the $80,000,000 of silver to be coined each year we produce, exclusive of that used in manufactures and the arts, about $35,000,000. There is then left but $45,000,000 to be consumed by eight hundred millions of people, having a balance of trade in their favor of near $250,000,000 annually. Will these nations absorb this amount of silver?

India, with her two hundred and fifty millions of people, and with a circulation of but a little over $4 per capita, with balance of trade in her favor of $100,000,000 each year, starting upon a career of improvement and advancement which threatens our agricultural interests, must necessarily consume several hundred millions of silver before her demands are fully supplied. Thirty million dollars are appropriated this year to be expended in improvements. India was once "a sink of silver," and the prospects are that she will again become such to a greater extent than ever. It is fair to presume that this $45,000,000 of silver can be used elsewhere more profitably than in the United States, and that all we will be called upon to coin, if that, will be our own product.

Can we stand a coinage of $35,000,000 per annum? In 1851, with but little more than one-third of our present population, we coined $62,614,492 of gold. I not only believe we can stand the same, but that we must have it to save the people from financial destruction and ruin.

What is our real condition? Have we as much money as we need? The following table gives the circulation of the different countries in paper and coin:

Countries.	Per capita.
	Paper.	Coin.
Australia	$9 03	$25 01
Belgium	11 38	23 93
Cuba	32 17	22 07
France	15 16	39 41
Great Britain	5 77	19 31
Netherlands	18 92	18 34
United States	17 63	16 88

When we consider the almost unlimited expanse of our territory, the unbounded resources of our country, we at once conclude that we need at least as much of a circulation per capita as any other nation.

Our manufactured products in 1880 were $5,369,557,191, while those of France were only $2,350,252,500. Our agricultural products the same year amounted to over $2,225,000,000. With a production of $8,000,000,000 per annum, with 130,000 miles of railroad with a traffic of $800,000,000 a year, with a domestic trade estimated at $25,000,000,000 per year, with a population increasing at the rate of 3,000 per day, we should not fear a plethora of money from the free coinage of silver.

We have to-day $1,594,000,000 in coin and paper. It will take $1,376,000,000, nearly as much more, to give us the amount per capita that France has. For one I am in favor of opening the mints and letting the bright stream flow through the channels of trade and commerce unimpeded until "idle money becomes as unproductive as idle labor." Let us try the experiment. If it proves a failure we can easily abandon it before any serious harm is done.

We are told that—

that we already have more than the people want; that out of a coinage of $220,000,000 but $50,000,000 are in circulation, while $170,000,000 are in the Treasury and can not be forced out. I am free to confess that silver is not a convenient money and that it will not circulate to any large extent so long as something more convenient can be substituted for it with safety. The people want neither gold nor silver for the great bulk of transactions. They want paper money, and they will never permit the Government to abandon this policy. It is not because they have an antipathy to silver, not because they believe it cheap money, that it does not circulate, but because its representative, the silver certificate, is just as good and more convenient.

The Treasurer tells us that the use of certificates tends to make the silver dollar more unpopular. Why not say that the silver certificate is more popular than the coin, which is the fact. The demand for these certificates in 1880 and 1881 was so great that $66,000,000 were taken and paid for in gold coin, and this demand continued until the Secretary of the Treasury issued an order stopping the exchange. The same argument can with equal force be made against gold. The Comptroller of the Currency in his last report says:

The issue of gold certificates having been discontinued by the Government, and the amount of gold coin having rapidly increased, the banks in New York found it necessary to establish a depository of gold coin for the convenience of the clearing-house. This depository at the present time is the Bank of America, by which bank certificates of deposit were first issued on October 14, 1879. The amount of such certificates outstanding on January 1, 1880, was $25,610,000, and on October 1, 1883, was $22,955,000. The largest amount of coin on deposit was on January 21, 1882, namely, $45,533,000, the capacity of the vault having been increased since 1880.

Silver certificates will circulate upon a par with gold, and by the use of certificates, under free coinage, there need never be an idle dollar in the Treasury. If we are not to provide a currency in this manner, how are we to provide it? Our national-bank circulation is based upon the national debt, and with its rapid payment is fast disappearing. On November 1, 1882, this circulation amounted to $362,727,747. Now it is only $315,847,686, a contraction of $46,880,061. The contraction for the last year was $15,545,461. Our greenbacks are but a part of the debt and must be paid. How, then, are we going to fill this vacuum? There is no better, if any other, way than to issue certificates based upon coin in the Treasury. Under such a system every dollar of paper money would be the representative of a dollar in coin, and nothing better can be conceived.

SILVER IS CHEAP MONEY.

We are told that silver is cheap money, that it is unjust to creditors and a fraud upon the laboring men.

The advocates of gold have loudly proclaimed, and in tones of great sympathy, that the continued coinage of silver will so cheapen money that prices will immeasurably go up and the laboring classes be the greatest sufferers. The disinterested philanthropy of the man who opens his vaults, views his gold, and laments that money is likely to become cheap, to the great detriment and injury of the working classes, is wonderful. These gentlemen, however, are the first to discover that cheap money means low wages. It has always been the prevalent idea that money was fixed and unchangeable, and that it was the price of commodities that fluctuated. True, when the price of commodities is high, money may be said to be correspondingly low; and when commodities are low, money may be said to be high.

Labor has always been considered the first and greatest of commodities. When money is cheap, prices are inflated and wages go up. When money is dear, prices are depressed and wages go down. There is not a laboring man to be found who does not know that when prices are up wages are not only high but work plenty; that when prices are down wages are low and work difficult to obtain. When prices are falling there is discontent and disaster; when they are rising there is pleasure and prosperity. As truly stated by the silver commission:

A rise in the value of money and a fall in general prices are the greatest evils which can befall the world. * * * An increasing value of money and falling prices have been and are more fruitful of human misery than war, pestilence, or famine. They have wrought more injustice than all the bad laws which were ever enacted.

The effects of dear money and falling prices upon labor was forcibly stated by the commission, as follows:

Labor, unlike money, can not be hoarded. The day's labor unperformed is so much capital lost forever to the laborer and to society. It being his only capital, his only means of existence, the laborer can not wait on better times for better wages. Absolute necessity forces him to dispose of it on any terms which the owners of money may dictate. These are the conditions which surround the laborer throughout the commercial world to-day. The labor of the past is enslaving the labor of the present, at least that portion of the labor of the past which has been crystallized into money is enabled through a shrinkage of its volume and while lying idle in the hands of its owners to increase its command over present labor and over all forms of property and to transform vast numbers of honest and industrious workmen into tramps and beggars. These laborers must make their wants conform to their diminished earnings. They must content themselves with such things as are absolutely essential to their exisience. Consumption is therefore constantly shrinking toward such limits as urgent necessities require. Production, which must be confined to the limits indicated by consumption, is constantly tending toward its minimum, whereas its appliances, built up under more favorable conditions, are sufficient to supply the maximum of consumption.

Thus idle labor, idle money, idle machinery and idle capital stand facing each other, and the stagnation spreads wider and wider. The future affords no hope or prospect of improvement, except through a change in financial policies. Prices have been persistently falling throughout the world since 1873, and as fast and as far in specie-paying countries as elsewhere. If the policy of chaining the industry and commerce of the world to a single metal be persisted in by the United States, Germany, and other European countries acting in concert with them, money must still rise in value and prices must continue to fall. The depression in productive industry will become more deathless and the number of idle laborers will indefinitely multiply.

These words are no less true to-day than when penned eight years ago. I am as loath to utter words that would excite any feelings of hostility between labor and capital as any one, but I feel that I would not be discharging my duty to my constituency, and especially to the laborers I represent, did I not make their condition known. I am familiar with their troubles and wants. I have talked with them, associated with them, until I am confident I know their anxieties and distresses.

I speak for as many laboring men in diversified pursuits as any man upon this floor, and when I tell you that a large portion of them are and have been idle for months, yea, years, while the balance are working on short time at reduced wages, you may gain some idea of the hardships and struggles through which they have passed. They are law-abiding, intelligent, and industrious; they are struggling by every honest and honorable effort, by mutual aid, and by organization to keep their heads above the billows until the shore is reached; but unless there is a change in the financial and other policies of this Government I fear their struggle will be hopeless.

Sir, I am no alarmist, but I am willing to meet great and serious questions when brought face to face with them, and I know, and if others do not they soon will know, that the greatest problem Congress has to solve is the labor question. Our laws relating to finances and revenue, trade and commerce, must be so adjusted as to give the greatest advantages to those who toil in the fields and in the mills, in the factories and in the mines. Our advance as a people depends upon the prosperity of our laboring classes, and our security as a nation upon the respect they have for its laws and institutions.

There is another fact involved in the suspension of coinage more appalling than all others. It is frightful to contemplate what the abject condition of the people might be

SHOULD SILVER MONEY BE STRICKEN DOWN.

The world to-day contains but $3,513,000,000 of gold, a sum insufficient of itself to answer our own demands twenty-five years hence. Strike down $3,750,000,000 of silver and a contraction of values will follow that will swallow up in the vortex of bankruptcy and ruin every individual who owes a considerable debt. Our indebtedness has been estimated as follows:

Statement of the national, State, county, municipal, and railroad debt in the United States, and an estimate of the individual, real, and personal mortgage debt.

United States, 1885	$1,438,542,995
Aggregate State, funded and unfunded, 1885	262,175,245
Territorial, 1880	179,178
County, 1880	123,877,068
Municipal	698,270,199
Railroad, funded, 1884	3,669,115,772
Individual mortgages (estimated)	6,000,000,000
Total	12,193,161,057

Suspend the coinage of silver, contract your national debt bank currency at the rate of $15,000,000 a year, and let the banks of New York lock up the gold, and then picture to yourselves the condition of our Western people, where almost every home and farm is under mortgage to Eastern capital. The dreadful consequences of such a policy were forcibly illustrated by the silver commission in their report, where they say:

At the Christian era the metallic money of the Roman Empire amounted to $1,800,000,000. By the end of the fifteenth century it had shrunk to less than $200,000,000. During this period a most extraordinary and baleful change took place in the condition of the world. Population dwindled and commerce, arts, wealth, and freedom all disappeared. The people were reduced by poverty and misery to the most degraded conditions of serfdom and slavery. The disintegration of society was almost complete. The conditions of life were so hard that individual selfishness was the only thing consistent with the instincts of self-preservation. All public spirit, all generous emotions, all the noble aspirations of man shriveled and disappeared as the volume of money shrunk and as prices fell.

It is because of the shrinkage of values as well as the detriment to labor that I raise my voice and utter a protest against this crusade that has been in the past so successfully waged in behalf of the moneyed interests, to the utter and almost complete destruction of the welfare of the people.

The people of the West are in debt; their farms, their homes, and in many instances their beds, are mortgaged. They have been paying exorbitant rates of interest to the East until they are impoverished. The prices of their products have fallen, their lands shrunk in value, until they begin to stagger beneath the weight of their burdens. They are energetic, laborious, and patriotic. During the days when the nation's body was bleeding from a hundred wounds and its life trembling in the balance they poured out their richest blood and treasure that it might be saved. They faced the death-dealing grape and canister upon a hundred fields that this Government might be preserved as one great indissoluble nation, and they now ask that in the majesty of its strength and power its great strong arm shall not be raised to at one blow strike them down to want and beggary. [Great applause.]

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I take it that statesmanship is never directed to better purpose than when it aspires to make the great masses of people contented and happy. Every government is indebted to the individual citizen. It owes him something more than the mere protection of his person and the right of property. The humblest citizen has a right to demand that the laws be just, and that the impartial spirit of perfect equality shall pervade them; and he has a right to complain whenever any law is enacted or any policy pursued which tends in its effect to confer advantages not common to all. Nay, more; it is not too much to say that a government has no moral right to enact a law or enforce a policy in the benefits of which the great masses of the people affected by it can not ordinarily participate, much less enact a law or enforce a policy which confers special privileges or opportunities upon a few to the possible detriment of the many.

The prosperity and happiness of the greatest possible number should be the highest aim of government, and all the policies of government, legislative and administrative, should be directed to that end. Mere statutory enactment, it is true, can not make a nation prosperous or a people happy. Those conditions must depend mainly on individual endeavor. The silent words within the lids of a law-book can not take the place of the husbandman in the field or the artisan in the workshop. There must be both good government, wisely administered, and a brave, intelligent, industrious, and frugal people to uphold it, in order to secure the best results, and good results ought always to be achieved, where those conditions exist.

Wherever you find a country possessing good natural advantages, inhabited by brave men and noble women, who love their homes and their country and have bold hearts and willing hands, you ought to find a contented people. If you do not you are apt to find something wrong at the sources of political power—something wrong with the government. You are apt to find it despotic, corrupt, or at fault in its economic policies. Just over the blue sea Ireland stands, a miserable picture before the world. And yet the eloquence of her orators, the songs of her poets, the prowess of her warriors, the blood of her martyrs have demonstrated her capacity for great achievement in all the spheres of human endeavor and given her the first place on that page of history dedicated to patriotism.

A country that has given to the world such names as Ireland has ought not to be what Ireland is, and would not be except for the domination of that power whose iron hand upholds a vandal policy within her borders which makes serfs of her heroes. The woes of Ireland are due to unjust laws, oppressive policies, and bad government. There are somber pictures all over Europe. In all the empires from St. Petersburg to Madrid there is deep and perilous discontent. In all those countries there are great peoples with great histories, and in all of them there is everything necessary to human comfort and happiness, from the plains of the Volga to the Danube and the Rhine, and still on to the "sunny lands" where summer winds sweeping over southern seas are sweetened with blooming orchards and the melting fruits that hang, like wine-drops, on bending vines. But everywhere, instead of the people being prosperous, light-hearted, and happy, there is disorder, discontent, unrest, and tumult.

In Russia the people are crouching like famished wild beasts, seeking and inventing opportunities to destroy. In Germany they are sullen and uneasy. In Spain there is in every house a sense of insecurity and danger. And even in conservative London, within a month past, a furious mob trampled law and order under its feet, and fifty thousand hungry men plundered at pleasure. There is something wrong somewhere. Those conditions are not the outgrowth of natural causes. They are evils that spring from the blighting waste of bad government. The truth is, Mr. Chairman, that nearly all the great evils that afflict mankind in the aggregate are the result of bad government in some form or other.

Sir, it would seem that if there is any spot on this green earth where the sun of prosperity ought to shine along the pathway of industry—any country beneath the stars where light hearts ought to be found in every home—it is in this favored land of ours. There is scarcely a blessing that God can give that this country has not received. We are the masters of a continent equal to all Europe in area, and rich in all the bounties that generous nature can bestow. In shadowy forest and grassy plain; in soil and climate; in adaptability, capacity, and variety of production; in mineral deposits; in the precious metals that interlace our mountain ranges like glittering webs of wonder, and need only the enterprising hand of labor to be exposed; in commercial waters, from the vast oceans around us to the great rivers that pour their turbid floods across the continent into the blue and laughing waves of the sea; in industrial development and progress, exhibiting among its material results 550,000,000 acres of land in actual cultivation, yielding an annual production valued at more than $4,500,000,000, and over 200,000 manufacturing establishments adding annually to the world's productions $5,500,000,000—with 115,672 miles of railroad, nearly one-half of all there is in the world, and enough to belt the earth four times and more, stretched like iron arms in every direction across the country and constituting the nation's great highways of commerce and travel; while 154,650 miles of telegraph wire—more than there is in Great Britain, France, Germany, and Austria combined—is spread like a great spider-web over the continent, flashing intelligence from post to post both day and night; in devotion to intellectual and moral culture and development, which gives among its results three hundred and seventy prosperous colleges and universities scattered through the States, and a public school to almost every neighborhood, requiring an annual expenditure of more than $100,000,000 to support them, with magnificent public and semi-public libraries in easy reach of every citizen of the Republic, so that with these advantages we stand to-day in the front rank of the most enlightened nations of the world; in all these things, Mr. Chairman, and in everything affecting the natural and artificial growth of the country, and the moral and intellectual conditions of our people, this land has been blessed abundantly.

I say, sir, in a country like this, unequaled in its resources and marvelous development, and inhabited by a brave, free, moral, enlightened, enterprising, aggressive people—still a new country, striding forward in its progress to a maturity yet far in the future, while all the world is contributing to its population, wealth, and power—it would seem if prosperity and peace could find a habitation anywhere on earth it would be in the homes of our people.

In the aggregate our people have been prosperous—marvelously so; and as a rule a prosperous people are a contented people, but ours are not contented. While we congratulate ourselves and boast to others about our national development, and the growth of our power and resources, we know that among the people and in their homes there is complaint, unrest, and discontent. The anomaly exists of a phenomenal aggregate prosperity, of an incalculable increase in national wealth, while the great masses of the people whose hands have created this prosperity and wealth are individually poor. The prosperity which has distinguished our national career in recent years, though it has been great, has not been healthful, because it has not been distributed among the industrial classes of the country—our farmers, artisans, and laborers, who comprise the great body of our people. They are in debt, but not because they are extravagant; they are poor, but not because they are indolent; they are without employment, but not because they are unwilling to work.

The bureaus of statistics exhibit a constant augmentation of aggregate wealth, while evil reports of hard times, destitution, discontent, and disorder are flooding in upon us from every quarter of the Union. Why is this? Why is it that in the midst of this apparent general prosperity there is a cloud over the hearts and homes of our people? To my mind the answer is a simple one. The powers of this Government have not been administered in the interest of the masses. That is a statement no honest man ought to make who does not candidly believe it. I do so believe it, and hence I do not hesitate to assert it, whatever may be the danger of misconstruction or censure. The great truth that all men are created equal, and endowed with the unalienable rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, and that governments are instituted to secure those rights, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed, is asserted in the Declaration of Independence, and it is declared in the very preamble of the Constitution that it was ordained and established to promote the general welfare and secure the blessings of liberty to the people. That is the true purpose of all good government, and when it is administered in that spirit it is wise, beneficent, and just; but when it departs from that rule it is fraught with oppression, danger, and disaster.

Every executive and legislative act, every policy of the Government, should have for its inspiration and motive the promotion of the happiness and prosperity of the whole people of the whole country. There is about this Government no characteristic of paternity, no halo of divinity. It is the mere incorporate creation of the people, the agent of the people, deriving all its powers from their hands, in trust, to be exercised for their benefit, and it is an abuse of the trust whenever any policy is attempted which has not for its supreme aim and end the welfare of the greatest possible number. These are old and familiar principles, but they are just as sound and absolutely essential to good government to-day as when they first found form in the conscience and hope of mankind.

But in recent years those old principles have not been potential, they have not prevailed in the practical administration of the powers of Government. Was it for the benefit of the masses that 200,000,000 acres of the public lands were bestowed as a gratuity upon a dozen railroad corporations, and in a way that practically exempts them from taxation? Was it for the good of the people that the Government created these corporations, endowed them with this princely domain, indorsed their obligations for multiplied millions, and then surrendered to them the control of our interior commerce with unrestricted power over the profits of labor and production? Was it for the good of the people that the Government adopted a policy that benefited a few local interests and laid the foundations of a few great individual fortunes, but which lost us our supremacy over the seas, left our sea-fronts defenseless for want of a navy to protect them, and our commerce at the mercy of the merchant marine of foreign nations, who have no pride in our growth at home nor interest in our commercial prosperity abroad, except in so far as they realize a profit as the carriers of our trade?

Was it for the benefit of the masses that a policy was adopted that enables a few lumber merchants to amass millions by compelling every man who builds a roof over his head to pay enormous tribute into their coffers? Was it for the benefit of the people that a system of laws was enacted under the operation of which a few thousand have been able in a short time to accumulate vast fortunes at the expense of those who sow and reap, who toil in the workshops and delve in the earth, and which at the same time lays the heaviest burdens of Government upon the galled shoulders of the poor by imposing the weight of taxation on the necessaries of life? Was it in the interest of the people that Congress passed a law in 1869 declaring that bonds to the amount of $2,500,000,000 should be paid in gold and silver coin, which, prior thereto, were payable in paper as well as coin, and for which the holder paid the Government in paper when he bought them, and that, too, at a time when, by reason of the doubtful issue of the war, paper had depreciated until it was worth only 50 cents on the dollar? Was it in the interest of the masses that, influenced by the fear of the bondholder that the act of 1869 might be repealed and the original contract revived, Congress was induced to pass the act of 1870 by which the old bonds were exchanged for new ones, providing on their face that they should be paid in standard coin alone, and be exempt from every species of taxation? Was it in the interest of the masses that Congress passed another law in 1873 striking silver from the coinage of the country, thereby depriving the people of the opportunity, if not the right, to pay any part of their enormous public debt in that metal, and leaving them empty-handed to meet their vast obligations in gold alone? Is it in the interest of the people, since the coinage of silver has been partially restored, that the Secretaries of the Treasury uniformly refuse to utilize the silver in the Treasury vaults in the payment of either the principal or interest of the public debt, and pursue a policy which tends to dishonor and degrade this money of the people, made such by the Constitution of the country? Is it in the interest of the people that a stupendous banking system has been organized, furnished with capital, and clothed with powers that give it practical mastery over the finances of the country?

Sir, these questions need no answer. They find response in the sad results to which they point—in the complaints, discontent, and distress of the people. Public policy has been turned from its legitimate channels, and we have drifted into vicious systems. A thing has grown up in this country called the "money power." If it has not a tangible individuality, it is a positive reality. There are a number of great corporations scattered over the country controlling enormous properties, whose individual stockholders own estates worth from $10,000,000 to $200,000,000, which they have been enabled to accumulate suddenly and rapidly by reason of the opportunities for plundering the masses conferred upon them by wicked legislation and vicious public policies. These great interests are organized into associations and syndicates, and banded together in alliances in such a way that they can co-operate with discipline and system. Over the commercial and monetary affairs of the country these organizations have become omnipotent. They are able to expand or contract the circulating medium almost at pleasure, create and alter financial conditions to accommodate their purposes, and extort at will from the tired hand of labor.

The greatest officers of the Government are under the witchery of their influence, and the pliant hinges of legislation are bent as they command. The council-rooms of these great associations are the schools in which are now taught our politics and economics, and their graduates are the ideal statesmen of the country. No wonder, with their disciplined organization and splendid equipment, they have been able to overwhelm opposition and enforce their demands in the past, and there need be no surprise if they win new victories in the future. The battle is on already. This money power is making another advance. In 1873, by surreptitious means, the silver dollar was eliminated from the coinage of the country. In 1878 it was partially restored. Now we are confronted with a proposition to repeat the policy of 1873 and cease coining silver dollars altogether. Is it an improper statement, one that ought not to be made by a man who desires to be just, who does not wish to mislead his countrymen or practice the arts of the demagogue, to say that this attack upon silver coinage is inspired by the money power? This much I do know—that the bondholders, banking associations, and great money syndicates are demanding the repeal of the act of 1878 and the suspension of the coinage of standard silver dollars. I know the appeal is made in the name of labor. I know it is said that the prosperity of the industrial classes demands suspension. By almost every mail I receive some book, pamphlet, or circular from some great establishment admonishing me of my duty as a Representative, and replete with argument intended to convince me that I can best serve my constituents—the farmers, miners, mechanics, and laborers who sent me here—by voting to contract the circulating medium and increase the burden of taxation.

Sir, all these abuses of power to which I have alluded—all these wrongs that have been done under the forms of law, have been perpetrated in the name of the people. "O Liberty! what crimes have been committed in thy name!"

But, sir, I know the voice of the masses is against this thing. I know the toiling, debt-ridden millions are opposed to the discontinuance of silver coinage and the practical demonetization of silver. Why should they not be? Why should silver be demonetized? Is it because the volume of our circulating medium is too great? Is it because we have absolutely too much money in this country? The per capita circulation in France, the most prosperous country in Europe, is one and two-thirds times as great as that of the United States, and the average circulation of Great Britain, France, and Germany is equal to that of the United States.

When we consider the extent of our territory, the character and diversity of our industries, the cost of production, the difficulties of communication, the expense of transportation, the habits and needs of our people, and the fact that this is still a new country requiring money as well as muscle to develop it, and that our population is constantly and rapidly augmenting, the logic of common sense would teach us that a larger per capita circulation is required to meet our conditions than is required in those older countries where large populations are crowded into small territories and all their industries are in close proximity. The area of France is 204,030 square miles, with an average population of 190 to each square mile; in Germany there are 208,624 square miles, with 217 people to each; in England, Ireland, and Scotland, 121,571 square miles, with 290 people to each. They are close, compact communities. There is contiguity of residence and business, and money circulates rapidly and readily from hand to hand and from place to place. Many of our States are alone almost as large, and one larger, in area than either of the three countries I have designated, while in the United States there are 3,602,990 square miles, with an average of only fourteen human beings to the square mile. The volume of circulation which would be sufficient for a population jammed together as they are in England, France, or Germany would no more meet the requirements of our conditions than would the red blood which keeps life in a humming-bird supply the veins and arteries of an ostrich. Besides, as I have already said, we are a debt-burdened and debt-paying people. The Director of the Mint reports the form and location of our circulating medium on July 1, 1885, as follows:

	In Treasury.	In national banks.	In other banks and general circulation.	Total.
Gold bullion	$66,847,095			$66,847,095
Silver bullion	4,654,586			4,654,586
Gold coin	179,952,890	$90,758,947	$271,462,799	542,174,636
Silver dollars	165,413,112	7,000,000	31,471,269	203,884,381
Fractional silver coin	31,236,899	1,897,554	41,805,367	74,939,820
Gold certificates	13,593,410	74,816,920	51,491,316	139,901,646
Silver certificates	38,370,700	3,139,070	98,813,370	140,323,140
United States notes	45,047,378	79,701,352	221,990,236	346,738,966
National-bank notes	9,945,710	23,465,388	285,165,613	318,576,711
Fractional currency	3,285	489,927	6,470,963	6,964,175
	555,065,065	281,269,158	1,008,670,933	1,845,005,156

Thus it will be seen that our total possible circulation is $1,845,005,156. Of this at least $100,000,000 of coin—gold coin—is permanently retained in the Treasury to secure the redemption of the United States notes. So that if we treat the remainder as available circulation we have $1,745,005,156, which is about $34 per capita of our population. In a compilation of statistics recently made by Mr. Spofford, Librarian of Congress, our national, State, county, and municipal indebtedness is stated at about $2,892,286,738, which is over $57 per capita. So that for every dollar in circulation there is $1.58 of public indebtedness, to say nothing of that vast, unknown quantity which aggregates the sum of private indebtedness.

These public debts must be paid, these private debts must be paid, local governments must be supported, our children must be educated, our families must be fed and clothed, our commerce and trade must go on, our development must go on, the increase in our population and the enterprises of our people must go on—and to the end that all these things shall be done there must be an easy, liberal circulation of money among the people or there will be stagnation, poverty, and distress. Our most prosperous eras have been those when money was plentiful and circulated freely from hand to hand. Then enterprise was on the wing, the products of labor found welcome in the markets of the country, and labor itself rejoiced in constant employment at liberal wages, and the people were contented and happy. Whenever the conditions have been reversed the result has been reversed. No, sir; the coinage of silver should not be discontinued because of any plethora in the present volume of our circulation.

But, it is said, the coinage of the standard silver dollar should be stopped because it is a cheap dollar—an 80-cent dollar. An "80-cent dollar," indeed! If that is true, how happens it?

I have an instructive table here, to which I invite the attention of the House and the country, showing the value in gold of the standard silver dollar of 412½ grains for a period of forty years:

Years.	Value in gold.	Years.	Value in gold.
1834	101.62	1854	104.26
1835	101.20	1855	103.95
1836	101.72	1856	103.95
1837	100.98	1857	104.69
1838	100.88	1858	103.95
1839	102.36	1859	105.22
1840	102.36	1860	104.58
1841	101.83	1861	103.10
1842	100.77	1862	104.16
1843	100.34	1863	104.06
1844	100.88	1864	104.06
1845	100.46	1865	103.52
1846	100.56	1866	103.63
1847	101.20	1867	102.67
1848	100.88	1868	102.57
1849	101.30	1869	102.47
1850	101.83	1870	102.67
1851	103.42	1871	102.57
1852	102.57	1872	102.25
1853	104.26	1873	100.46

Thus it will be seen that for forty years this contemptible old dollar commanded a premium. On the very day that it was struck by a coward hand in the dark in 1873 it was worth more than gold. But it was full of menace to the bondholder, the national banks, and the money-power. The great mines of the West were increasing in number and productive capacity. The swelling stream of treasure they were pouring into the mints was expanding the volume of our circulation, and assured the early payment of our non-taxable bonded debt and the downfall of the national banking system. So the coinage of silver was forbidden, and the doors of the mints were closed against it. From that day to this it has been assailed in every conceivable form. What with Congress legislating against it, with the Executive Departments discriminating against it, with the banks condemning it, with the metropolitan press denouncing it, with skilled debaters inveighing against it in these halls and throughout the country, with an army of financial colporteurs scattering tracts full of appalling prognostication and evil prophecy, if it is not stripped of its eagles and its image of liberty, it is a miracle that the old thing has any life left in it. But still it is here holding its own. Still it is here the favorite of the common people, who resolutely refuse to be divorced from it. Quoted in the bullion markets at a discount, the coined dollar goes serenely on its way, returning the friendship of the poor man by buying for him more of the comforts of life than it was ever able to do before, and conquering its enemy, the great banker who covers it with contumely and reproach, by forcing him to falsify his profession of faith by his practice, for not one can be found who will exchange 100 cents in silver for 80 cents in gold, or make any exchange except upon terms of perfect equality. Certainly in all the local uses to which money can be put, in all the domestic affairs of our people, whether in the banks or out of them, silver is the peer of gold. No, sir; there is no reason in this view of the case why silver should be debased and dishonored.

But, we are told, if we do not stop piling up these silver dollars, if the Bland act is not repealed, gold will take wing and fly affrighted from the country, and we will be reduced to the barbarous condition of silver monometallism. This is the strong point of the advocates of suspension. We are told that the great powers of Europe have practically ceased the coinage of silver and have adjusted their monetary affairs to the single standard of gold, which they say has resulted in depressing the value of silver all over the world; and that if we go on maintaining both metals as legal-tender money, in spite of the difference in their value, our gold will be displaced by foreign silver as one of the inevitable results of international trade and exchange.

We are told that the time is fast approaching when the American who buys in Europe can pay only in silver, and, as he is compellsd to trade on a gold basis, will have to pay $1.20 (perhaps more) for every dollar's worth of goods he buys; while the European who receives the silver can return it here and use it at par in his purchases in this country, and that such inequality can only result in speedy disaster to our commerce and ruin to our people. The theme is enlarged and amplified in divers ways, but always before our terrified vision is kept the spectral panorama of stagnated industry, expiring commerce, wretched people, and crumbling power. Some of these philosophers have been so good as to send me books full of these discussions and prophecies, and luminous as midnight in their exemplifications of the science of finance. I have essayed to go through some of them. I approached the task with a feeling akin to that which inspired the old Greeks who sought wisdom from the Delphic oracle, and with about as good result.

Through all these discussions runs the mysticisms of the doctrinaire. Dogmatic in assertion, they announce their speculative opinions with an air of supreme authority, indifferent alike to the logic of experience and the facts of history. If the facts of history, if the experiences of the past throw any light upon the future, then we have little reason to apprehend the dangers with which the anti-silver philosophers threaten and seek to intimidate us. The truth is the coin balances are in our favor. In 1885 we exported $8,477,892 in gold and imported $26,691,696, a balance in our favor of $18,213,804; and of the gold imported $17,679,600, or nearly three-fourths, came from England, Germany, and France. At the same time we exported $33,753,633 in silver and imported $16,550,627, a balance against us of $17,203,006. Of the silver imported into this country only $36,444 came from England, France, and Germany. In other words, notwithstanding the Bland act was in full operation, and notwithstanding the price of silver was quoted lower than for fifty years, in 1885 we actually imported over $18,000,000 more gold than we exported, and at the same time exported over $17,000,000 more silver than we imported. That is one fact.

Another fact is that the wage-workers in England, France, and Germany are ordinarily paid in silver, and that metal circulates freely in those countries, and in all the great commercial countries of the world. There is more silver in the Bank of France to-day, to say nothing of what may be in the hands of the people, than our entire silver coinage amounts to, and it circulates as a legal tender, and will buy as much as gold. For domestic uses silver is as good as gold in all the great powers of Europe, as well as in America.

Another fact is that silver is being constantly coined in England, France, and Germany. In 1882 Great Britain coined $1,021,381 in silver, and not a dollar in gold; in 1883 she coined $6,831,169 in gold and $6,201,517 in silver; in 1884 she coined $11,309,819 in gold and $3,204,824 in silver. In 1882 Germany coined $3,167,085 in gold and $6,407,157 in silver; in 1883 she coined $21,002,897 in gold, and $594,564 in silver; in 1884 she coined $13,723,494 in gold, and $114,319 in silver. In 1882 France coined $722,206 in gold, and $223,853 in silver. In 1883 no work was done at the mints of France. In 1884 she coined $23,160 in silver, and none in gold. So far, then, as these three great powers—the most enlightened commercial powers of Europe—are concerned, silver is still coined at their mints and circulates among their peoples.

Again, the coinage of the world, so far as reported, in 1884 was $99,459,240 of gold and $90,039,443 in silver. In view of all these facts contradicting the speculative theories of our financial philosophers and of the further fact that silver comprises more than one-half the metal money of the world, I see no good reason for apprehending that the continued coinage of silver at our mints will drive gold from our borders.

Then, sir, if it be true, as I hold it is, that the extent of our circulating medium is not such as to demand a reduction of its volume; if the people have confidence in silver money and it circulates freely among them and answers the requirements of domestic trade, if its continued coinage does not endanger our commerce or imperil our interests abroad, why should it be further discredited by unfriendly legislation? What interest of the masses can be subserved, in what way can their prosperity be promoted, by such a policy? I can understand why the bondholder and the money-lender should desire this thing. I can understand how such a policy would increase the value of their securities, add to the purchasing capacity of their money, and enlarge their power over the business of the country. It is simply one more advantage they seek. But I can not see any reason why the great industrial classes of our people should desire it. They do not desire it. Their interests, their prosperity, and happiness point the other way—to an increase in our circulation, to the free and unlimited coinage of silver upon an equality with gold. In that direction the faces of the people are turned, and though the opposition is better prepared and equipped for battle, I have never known the will of the people to be thwarted when they are once aroused and determined. I think this issue had as well be fought out now as hereafter. There is no good in delay. The lines are drawn; let the fight go on. Let the question of supremacy between the people and the money power be settled. If Mammon is master, the people like galled jades must wince and bear it, and we will go on as we have been. But if the people themselves are sovereign, then we can make the close of this contest the auspicious beginning of a new and better era when all the policies of administration and all the powers of government shall be administered and enforced with an eye single to the prosperity of the whole people of the whole country. I shall be glad to see our skies brighten with the rising sun of that new day. It does not require the eye of prophet or poet to see the picture that lies beyond it—of fresh vitality in all our varied industries, with the burdens of taxation decreased and decreasing, with our commerce and finances freed from corporate control, with our old supremacy on the high seas restored, and best of all, as a consequence of these things, a beautiful and prosperous country thronged with happy homes, in and out of which the people are passing ever with light step and buoyant hearts. [Applause.]

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I present a joint resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, in reference to the bill passed by the two Houses of Congress providing for the relief of settlers on the Des Moines River lands; which I ask may be read, and ordered to lie on the table for the present.

The joint resolution was read, and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Whereas the General Assembly of the State of Iowa has, at different sessions, by memorials and joint resolutions, expressed the sympathy of the State with its citizens who, in good faith and under the invitation of the officers of the United States Government, settled upon the lands lying within the limits of what is now known as the grant to the Des Moines Navigation and Railroad Company, and the urgent desire of the State that Congress should promptly pass a bill looking to proceedings quieting the title to such settlers, and permitting them to own and to continue to occupy the homes they have made on said lands; and

Whereas a bill has passed both Houses of Congress having for its purpose to secure to said settlers the peaceful possession and title to the homes they have created by their labor and the expenditure of their means through many years, and to which they are justly entitled, and the eviction from which must inevitably cause them severe hardships and very great pecuniary loss, which bill the President of the United States has refused to approve: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the senate of the Twenty-first General Assembly of the State of Iowa (the house of representatives concurring), That the Iowa delegation in Congress merit the thanks of this General Assembly, which are hereby tendered, for their efficient efforts in obtaining the passage of said bill.

Resolved further, That it is with deepest regret that this General Assembly has learned of the veto of said measure by the President; and that by this veto the President has disappointed the just expectations of the people of Iowa.

Resolved, That the secretary of state is hereby directed to forward to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress a certified copy of these resolutions.

I hereby certify that the above and foregoing is a true copy of the concurrent resolutions as the same appear on file in my office.

In witness whereof I hereunto set my hand and affix the great seal of state. Done at the capitol in Des Moines this 18th day of March, A. D. 1886, of the Independence of the United States the one hundred and tenth and of the State of Iowa the fortieth.

[SEAL.]

FRANK D. JACKSON,
Secretary of State.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I also present a joint resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, favoring the enactment of certain legislation granting pensions to soldiers of the Union Army of the late war who were, during that time and while in the discharge of duty, captured and confined in confederate prisons, &c., which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HARRIS. Do I understand the Senator to ask that the memorial be printed in the RECORD?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It is very brief.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is a joint resolution of the General Assembly of Iowa.

Mr. HARRIS. If it be from the General Assembly, of course I have no objection. I did not understand that it was from the General Assembly.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It is from the General Assembly of the State.

The memorial was referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Memorial and joint resolution by the house, the senate concurring.

Resolved, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress are requested to use all their influence and votes, at the earliest time possible, for the passage of an act for the pensioning of soldiers of the Union army of the late war who were during that time, while in the discharge of duty, captured and confined in confederate prisons; and that the secretary of state is requested to furnish each of our members in Congress a copy of this resolution.

Approved March 13, 1886.

I, Frank D. Jackson, secretary of state of the State of Iowa, hereby certify that the foregoing joint resolution and memorial is a true and correct copy of the original on file in my office.

In witness whereof I hereunto set my hand and affix the great seal of the State. Done at the capitol at Des Moines this 13th March, A. D. 1886, of the Independence of the United States the one hundred and tenth and of the State of Iowa the fortieth.

[SEAL.]

FRANK D. JACKSON,
Secretary of State.
D. W. SMITH, Deputy.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I also present a joint resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, in opposition to the passage of certain bills now pending in Congress in relation to manufactures of vinegar; which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint resolution and memorial for the protection of Iowa manufacturers.

Whereas there has been introduced into the Congress of the United States two certain bills, being Nos. H. R. 3291 and H. R. 3973, said bills being, in substance and effect, to compel all vinegar manufacturers, who distill low wines, either to pay the regular distiller's tax or buy their high wines from the distillers, or cease the manufacture of vinegar—in either event the increase in price to the consumer and the flooding of the market with cheap acid vinegar, as was the state of affairs previous to the present law: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the General Assembly, That the passage of such a law as is proposed in said bills would work great hardship to the consumer and the manufacturer of vinegars in the State of Iowa, and destroy, to a large extent, the present home market for corn, now furnished by the numerous manufacturers of vinegars in the State of Iowa.

Resolved, That our Senators be instructed and our Representatives requested to work and vote against said bills.

Resolved, That the secretary of state is hereby instructed to promptly forward to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress a properly attested copy of this resolution.

Approved March 13, 1886.

I, Frank D. Jackson, secretary of state of the State of Iowa, hereby certify that the foregoing joint resolution and memorial is a true and correct copy of the original on file in my office.

In witness whereof I hereunto set my hand and affix the great seal of the State. Done at the capitol at Des Moines this 13th day of March, A. D. 1886, of the Independence of the United States the one hundred and tenth and of the State of Iowa the fortieth.

Ordered, That the papers in the case of Mary C. Ringgold be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

EXECUTIVE SESSIONS WITH OPEN DOORS.

Mr. LOGAN submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That the sessions of the Senate commonly known as executive sessions, so far as they apply to nominations, confirmations, or rejections, shall hereafter be held with open doors, and that a public record of the same shall be kept the same as in legislative sessions.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask that the resolution lie upon the table, with a view of calling it up some morning on a future day and submitting a few remarks in reference to it. I do not wish to have it referred to a committee at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie on the table, if there be no objection.

REMOVAL OF FOURTH-CLASS POSTMASTERS.

Mr. INGALLS. On the 4th day of March instant I offered a resolution, which was agreed to by the Senate unanimously, calling on the Postmaster-General for information as to the number of fourth-class postmasters removed since the 4th day of March, 1885. Eighteen days have elapsed, and as the resolution called for nothing but the numbers of the removals, not asking for names or dates, it required merely a computation from the official registers of the Department, which it appears to me might have been done within two or three days at the utmost. I have no desire to assume that there has been any disinclination on the part of that officer to comply with the request of the Senate, but the information sought for was necessary in some remarks that I hoped to submit on the resolutions reported from the Judiciary Committee, and I know of no reason why the delay should have occurred. I therefore ask for the adoption of the resolution that I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas asks for the adoption of a resolution, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be directed to inform the Senate whether he received the resolution of March 4, calling for information as to the number of fourth-class postmasters removed in each of the States and Territories since March 4, 1885, and if said resolution has been received, why it has not been answered, and when a response may be expected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be printed and lie over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over under the rules and be printed.

Several SENATORS. Regular order.

EFFICIENCY OF THE ARMY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there are no further "concurrent or other resolutions" the morning business is closed, and the Chair, under the order of the Senate, lays before the Senate the bill (S. 777) to increase the efficiency of the Army of the United States as the unfinished business of the morning hour.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 777) to increase the efficiency of the Army of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on an amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN], which will be read:

The SECRETARY. At the end of section 1 add:

And regulations shall be established by the President prescribing a definite and graded penal code for the guidance of the summary courts provided for in this section in awarding punishment to offenders convicted before such courts.

Mr. LOGAN. Before that amendment is acted on, I desire to turn back to line 6 in section 1 of the bill. The Secretary of War suggests that as the provision is left in the bill the use of the word "line" would exclude the Engineer and Ordnance Corps, and he asks me to have it amended so as to include the two. After the word "line," in line 6, I move to insert the words "engineers, or ordnance;" so as to read:

May be brought before a summary court, which shall consist of a commissioned officer of the line, engineers, or ordnance, second in rank, &c.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator from Illinois permit me to present at this time the amendment of which I gave notice?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. I now rise for the purpose of moving the amendment of which I gave notice on Thursday last, and that is to strike out section 2 of the bill. That section reads as follows:

SEC. 2. That the number of enlisted men in the Army, including an engineer battalion of five hundred and twenty men, hospital stewards, and one thousand Indian scouts, be, and hereby is, established as a force not to exceed thirty thousand men.

My object, of course, in moving this amendment is to prevent, what I believe is not necessary, an increase of the Army of the United States. I am strongly of the belief that a force of twenty-five thousand enlisted men, that number being what is now provided for by existing law, is ample for all emergencies that may fall upon the Army of the United States.

Since 1874 this has been the limitation, and no investigation of mine, no examination into the subject, shows that the Army to-day is less efficient than it was twelve years ago. The Army to-day, if all the reports are correct made by its superior officers whose duty it is to report to Congress, is in better condition, man for man, than it was in 1874, when the limitation of twenty-five thousand men was fixed. There are less desertions, there is less drunkenness, the morale of the Army is better. Certainly there never were a brighter and abler set of men since the days of the war than now make up the officers of the Army of the United States.

For twelve years the Army of the United States with its present numbers has served all the purposes for which we maintain an army. It has conducted most important Indian warfare and always successfully. It has maintained a guard and protection upon our immense frontier line, and the raids and inroads of the Indians have from year to year grown less. I undertake to say that to-day there is largely less for our Army to do than there was in 1874 when this limitation of twenty-five thousand men was fixed, as it has remained ever since.

Since the debate opened upon this bill on Thursday last I have been looking over the different reports, the somewhat extensive literature that lies about all of the different measures and propositions for the reorganization of the Army, which came to a head in the year 1873–'74, and my investigation leads me to have no doubt that there was then more for an army of twenty-five thousand men to do than there is to-day.

In 1873–'74 both Houses of Congress investigated this whole subject most carefully and I think very thoroughly. The testimony of the great officers in the Army was taken upon the whole question of reorganization, upon the numbers of enlisted men and officers, of the duties to be performed, and of the necessities of the service. I find that General Sherman, in testifying before the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives, as found in their report made in 1874, in answer to certain questions put to him by General HAWLEY, then a member of the House and a member of the Military Committee, speaking of a certain regiment of cavalry, said:

That regiment is, therefore, strung from the Pacific Railroad, in the neighborhood of Cheyenne, northward through the Rocky Mountains up to Fort Ellis, in Montana—at least eight hundred miles of frontier. They are in the presence of probably three thousand of the most dangerous and hostile Indians on this continent.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Three thousand fighting men?

General SHERMAN. Yes. Sitting Bull, Bull Bear, Red Cloud, and these fellows can have three thousand Sioux for actual war if occasion arises.

I might, if I desired to take up the time of the Senate, follow this volume through, and everywhere in the testimony of General Sherman and General Sheridan and other leading officers of the Army is the disclosure of the situation at that time calling for the need of an efficient military force on our western frontier.

I find also in Senate documents in the Forty-fifth Congress, third session, that in the Senate of the United States General Burnside, then a Senator from Rhode Island, "from the Joint Committee on the Reorganization of the Army, submitted the report which I hold in my hand to accompany bill S. 1491," which provides for a most elaborate reorganization of the Army in line and staff, in enlisted men and officers; and I find that in accordance with the request of the committee different officers of the Army made an estimate of how the different parts of the Army, the different services, cavalry, infantry, artillery, &c., should be distributed upon a basis of twenty-five thousand enlisted men. General Sherman makes an estimate, as do General McDowell, General Townsend, and other well-known officers of the Army, showing that as the committees proceeded in this investigation the basis of twenty-five thousand men, that which we now maintain, more and more made a lodgment in the minds of the committee as a suitable number. The upshot of all that legislation was that in the Congress succeeding the law was established which has been maintained unbroken ever since, that the limitation of the enlisted men in the Army of the United States should be twenty-five thousand. There it has remained from that day to this.

For some years afterward the reports of the Secretary of War and sometimes of the General of the Army contained in them recommendations that the number should be increased to thirty thousand, but after a while, Congress in no way changing the limitation of twenty-five thousand, these requests were withdrawn, the increase was abandoned, and for the last several years I do not find it in any report either of the Secretary of War or of the General of the Army or of any leading officer of that branch of the service. I do not find that the Secretary of War desires it now; I do not find that the General of the Army desires it now, from the reports that they have submitted. And certainly if in the wisdom of Congress upon a full investigation nearly thirteen years ago twenty-five thousand men were found to be sufficient for all the purposes of our Army twenty-five thousand men or less than that would be ample to-day.

I undertake to say that the purposes for which an army may properly be employed, that the needs which may arise from day to day, and largely these are in the great West, are much less than they were thirteen or fourteen years ago. Why, Mr. President, during that time since 1873–'74 most important Indian wars have been carried on, have been fought and have been ended successfully by the Army of the United States with the numbers of men that Congress had given in 1873–'74—most important Indian wars. I have here a pamphlet which gives a list of the different Indian wars which the Army has put down since 1873—the Cheyenne war, the Sioux war, the Nez Percé, the Shoshone and Bannock, Mescalero Apache, and later the outbreaks in Texas and New Mexico and Arizona.

During these years with the men that we have furnished to the United States Army, the notable campaigns, if one may call them such, of General Howard, General Crook, General Terry, General Miles, and General Gibbon have all been undertaken and carried out successfully, and year by year the danger from the Indian has grown less and less and the fighting power of the Indian has become smaller each year. Such a statement as General Sherman made before the committee in 1874 could not be made now by any officer of the Army. It would be a literal impossibility to get three thousand fighting Indians together anywhere or everywhere. I doubt from what I can find in reading these reports whether within the last three years there have been one hundred and fifty fighting Indians on the war-path together at any one place. I do not say that I am absolutely correct in this, but I am very nearly correct. I know that they are much less from year to year as time goes on.

These wars to which I have alluded have all been successful, and the Indians have been put down, Sitting Bull and Bull Bear have been taken; Chief Joseph, I suppose one of the greatest of fighting Indians of modern times, has been overcome, and to-day the word comes that the last and most formidable of the Apache band, Geronimo, has surrendered voluntarily; and yet the bill provides that under these conditions we shall increase the Army five thousand men. I do not know what is going to be done with the men if they are added to the present force. And all the documents and all the reports show that, as stated by General Drum in his communication to the War Department of February 27, 1882, the average proportion of troops west of the Mississippi for the past ten years is 73.76 per cent. of the entire Army.

We may as well assume, unless some new service is disclosed in this debate for the additional five thousand men, that it is the Indian frontier and the security of the people upon that frontier and the treatment of the Indian in the great West that will occupy and absorb the Army for the future as it has in the past.

I do not believe that the Indian is as formidable to-day as he has been. I believe that under this process—you may call it the pounding process—that has been going on from year to year, under the repeated defeats, under the dispossession of the Indian of his old hunting-grounds and land, his spirit so far as fighting is concerned being broken, to-day the danger to the frontier is less than it was twelve years ago when we fixed the limit of the Army. The present Secretary of the Interior in his last report says on this subject:

The Indian race is no longer a source of danger to the peace or security of this great Republic. Most of the reservations are encircled by powerful communities, and those upon the frontier are completely in the hands of our military forces.

And yet the bill before us provides not as would logically follow from this condition that the Army may be reduced and the expense of it cut down, but that an addition of five thousand men shall be made to its force.

It has also been found—and I take it nobody knows it better than the Senator in charge of this bill [Mr. LOGAN] or the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] who has dealt so long and intelligently with the Indian question—that other methods besides force, besides the intervention of the Army, have tended to make the Indian less dangerous and have reduced the need of a great military establishment to protect the frontier from his ravage.

In the last report of the Lieutenant-General of the Army, General Sheridan, in treating of the divisions occupied by the Army and the service performed, says:

Following the Oklahoma invasion came the Cheyenne and Arapaho disturbance, which threatened for a time all the horrors of an Indian war. For the true cause of this trouble and the particulars of its settlement I refer to my report to the President made in July last.

Which is found in this document. He says further:

The speedy and firm action of the President in redressing the grievous wrongs that had been done the Cheyennes and Arapahoes, and the enlistment of a number of the young men of their tribes as scouts, obliterated a trouble which came near being very serious, and which, without a peaceful solution, would have been destructive of life and property on the borders of Kansas, Colorado, and Texas.

So that not only military force, not only military operations, not only Indian wars successfully pursued have reduced the Indian and made him less dangerous, but peaceful methods, more quiet processes have been adopted in the last twelve years resulting in the same end; and yet we are asked to increase the Army five thousand men!

Mr. President, I fail in any examination that I have made of this subject to see the need of this increase. It will be attended with a large additional expense; and while I do not complain of the extravagance of the Army and I think it should be properly maintained and encouraged, yet I think it well to call the attention of the Senate to the appropriations that we are making annually with the present establishment, because this should not be put aside either in considering the general proposition found in the section which I move to strike out, or other amendments that may be offered for increasing the officers and the general expense of the Army.

In the last regular appropriation bills for the Army we appropriated $24,014,402; in the legislative appropriation bill, for the clerical force which is needed to keep the accounts and the business of the Army, and which must be increased somewhat whenever you increase the Army, we appropriated additionally $2,071,295; and in the sundry civil appropriation bill for the other general purposes of the Army $4,475,771, an aggregate of thirty million five hundred and odd thousand dollars. So, as every member of the Appropriations Committee knows who deals with this subject, it has become settled that by and large it costs about a thousand dollars to maintain one man in the Army for a year. Of course I do not mean his pay; I do not mean his allowances; but I mean that, take it all in all, as you increase or decrease the number of men, the increase of expenditure or the decrease of expenditure will be found to be at about the rate of $1,000 a man. I have no doubt that if to-day the Army is increased as this bill proposes, with the other circumstances attendant, Congress will be called upon to appropriate something like $5,000,000 yearly in addition to what we are appropriating now.

Mr. President, I do not believe in a niggardly policy as to any of the Departments of the Government. I believe in a generous policy; but I do not think that in the present condition of the Treasury, in the present condition of the country, $5,000,000, or $4,000,000, or $3,000,000, whatever it may be admitted by the friends of this measure would be the additional cost, would be well invested in an increase of the Army.

I have tried to show how the main work for which an army is maintained has lessened from year to year, justifying a decrease rather than an increase, and I have yet to see outside of that where any need arises for an additional force. There is certainly no menace from abroad—never less than now—and the tremendous experiences that the country went through twenty-five years ago and in the years succeeding that time show how easy it is for the American people to improvise an army on an emergency. It would be no boast for us to say that in any critical danger calling for an increase of the American Army the "stamp of a foot" would be responded to by every increase demanded; and unless there is something permanent and needed from year to year, then the increase provided for in this biil has no ground to stand upon.

The Army in that regard is not like the Navy. You can not build a navy in one or two years or in five, perhaps not in ten. It takes forethought, deliberation, long plans; and the experience of all nations and of our own is that if you are going to increase the Navy, even if you do it in a moderate way, you find it impossible to do it in a hurry; it is a long job that must be undertaken. That is not the case with the Army.

Therefore, Mr. President, not claiming any extensive knowledge upon this branch of our service, never having served upon any of the military committees, but only interested upon the subject from an outside view as a Senator, and from the investigations I have made of the subject, I have felt constrained to oppose this provision and to move that this section be struck out.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, my observation leads me to a different conclusion from that of the Senator from Maine. Since 1874 unquestionably the population in this country has increased as much as twelve million, and that population is constantly crowding upon all of our Indian reservations. We are daily diminishing the resources of the Indians from hunting, and Indians had much rather fight than starve or labor; and therefore to me it seems probable that collisions with the Indians will rather increase than diminish.

The Senator from Maine seems to think it remarkable that we have succeeded in putting down a dozen Indian wars in the last twelve or thirteen years. Why, to be sure, in the process of time we have put them down, and in almost every instance where they have occurred the Department having charge of the military forces has had to gather them from distant places, fifty men at a time, from long distances; and therefore it has occurred that a long delay and much loss of life and expense have been suffered in consequence of our having at these posts in the West too small a number of men. If we had had a sufficient number of military in the West near the Indians these Indian wars might not have occurred. I do not believe they would have occurred if we had a respectable force anywhere near the reservations.

Then, again, take it on our Atlantic coast. We have not a sufficient force in any of our principal cities within our fortifications. If a foreign force of one hundred men were to land anywhere on our Atlantic shore, we have not a force competent to march out at once and meet an enemy of that kind. I do not say but that we could very soon raise a sufficient number of volunteers, but at the present time there is not a force at any of the posts on the Atlantic coast that could resist instanter an invasion of one hundred men. Therefore I have thought that it was no more than reasonable that there should be some increase of the Army, and that it would be sound economy to give it some increase.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I was somewhat surprised, I must confess, at one statement made by the Senator from Maine. I see he has been examining this question very carefully, and of course his opinions are entitled to consideration. But I desire to draw his attention especially to one point. He read rather extensively from the evidence of General Sheridan, General Sherman, and others who appeared before military committees at a time when the committees were arranging this organization of the Army. Did he find anywhere in that testimony that General Sherman or General Sheridan, or any of the leading officers of the Army, said twenty-five thousand troops were all that were necessary for the Army of the United States? Does he not know that that evidence was based upon the proposition that the committee proposed to reduce the Army to twenty-five thousand, and they were inquired of as to how the twenty-five thousand could be disposed of between the different arms of the service?

Mr. HALE. That is precisely what I stated, that they were requested to make their estimates upon that basis, and that as the result the limit was fixed at twenty-five thousand. I did not state what the generals said the total should be.

Mr. LOGAN. Now, I will venture the assertion that you can not find in any report or in the evidence of any officer in the Army of the United States of America since the war the statement that twenty-five thousand of an army was sufficient for the United States. I will venture that assertion, and I will go further: If the Senator will get a letter from General Sheridan, General Schofield, General Terry, or any other prominent officer in the Army, saying that twenty-five thousand men are competent for the Army of this Government, I will withdraw that proposition from the bill. I know they do not entertain those views.

I am not going to take up time in reading reports; I am not going to take up time in reading letters; but I have a letter in my drawer from General Schofield indorsing this bill fully and completely. I will not say what conversation I have had with General Sheridan or others, but I say to the Senator to-day that if he will find a leading officer of the Army who will agree with him in his proposition I will agree to strike this section out of the bill.

Now let me go a little further. The Senator says that the theory of increasing the Army to thirty thousand men was abandoned after this establishment was arranged under the bill that was agreed upon in 1874. The Senator is entirely mistaken in that statement, and I call his attention now to the fact.

Mr. HALE. What is that?

Mr. LOGAN. The statement of the Senator was that it had been abandoned; that since then no recommendation for it had been made.

Mr. HALE. For the last several years.

Mr. LOGAN. Why? I can state very briefly why. The Military Committee knows this to be the fact. Every bill that I have draughted since I have been on that committee, either in the Senate or the House, has been for an increase of the Army, and I have always been defeated and probably will be now. Time and again I have proposed thirty thousand as the establishment of the United States, not at this session merely, but in all preceding sessions when I have made an estimate or proposed a bill for the Army I have proposed thirty thousand. Not only that, but the Senator will remember that on the very committee he serves on now, the Committee on Appropriations, I was a member of the same committee at a time when the proposition came from the House to reduce this twenty-five thousand to twenty thousand, which came here some two or three times, I ever insisted on thirty thousand being the number that should be put in the bill, and proposed it in committee two or three times.

So then it has not been abandoned; and it never has been abandoned by any one having anything to do with it. I never abandoned it. The reason of the failure of officers of the Army to renew their recommendations and the reason why it was not renewed by the Secretary of War was because Congress paid no attention to their recommendations. As I said before, I have been defeated every time. Of course their recommendations ceased because there was no use of their making the recommendations when Congress paid no attention to the recommendations. That is the fact about that.

Mr. HALE. There is no issue between the Senator and me as to that. I know the Senator has been in favor of thirty thousand men; I know that for years after Congress fixed the limitation at twenty-five thousand men the Secretary of War and the General of the Army and other officers of the Army asked for thirty thousand and continued to do so, as I stated before; but three or four years ago these requests ceased.

Mr. LOGAN. That is true.

Mr. HALE. And in their reports nothing of the kind has been found since. Now the Senator says that the reason for that is that Congress time and again refused to comply with the request. That may have been so to a degree, but also the other consideration must have borne upon these officers' minds that the need for the Army on the frontier was growing less and less, and therefore they did not ask it.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well; now we will see. I want the Senator to understand that this proposition to increase the Army is not for any present needs; it is not because there is an Indian war; it is not because there is danger from Indians or danger from anywhere; it is not because I apprehend any danger from any source that I proposed this in the bill before the Military Committee, and that the Military Committee agreed to it, but it is that the Government of the United States may at least have an army that will have some respectability, when it is called the Army of the United States, both at home and abroad.

Now, what is its condition? I know it is perfectly natural for the Navy of the United States to desire a reduction of the Army, so that they may have larger appropriations for the Navy. But there ought not to be this strife between the Army and the Navy. I will say to the Senator who well represents the Naval Committee that there ought not to exist in the Senate or elsewhere a strife between the Army and the Navy with reference to the efficiency of either. They both ought to be efficient and both ought to be provided for, and both be an honor and a credit to the American people.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator think there is any such strife as that? Does the Senator think that really enters into this consideration?

Mr. LOGAN. I do not.

Mr. HALE. The Senator and I have been together on committees and important subcommittees touching naval appropriations and have always been found together.

Mr. LOGAN. And the Senator has always found me voting for them.

Mr. HALE. I was going to say that the Senator has always been found voting for liberal supplies to build up and restore the American Navy, and I do not think there is here now on this floor any antagonism between the two; certainly in my mind in opposing this section I do not in any way antagonize the Army with the Navy in the slightest degree.

Mr. LOGAN. This remark was only called out by the statement of the Senator just before he closed when he attempted to display before the Senate the appropriations for the Army as being $25,000,000 per annum, and therefore the Army ought not to be increased; in other words, the Army ought to be reduced; that would be the logic of the argument; and in the very same breath almost he insisted that the Navy needed appropriations different from the Army. I took it for granted that there was some little antagonism from that very remark. I do not wish to impute anything to the Senator that he does not design; but now let us go a little further.

I wish to say that so far as I am concerned I have had enough of war. I want no more war, either with whites, or with blacks, or with Indians, at home or abroad. I will always be found on the side of peace; but that is no argument against an organization of the Army. That is no reason why we should not have an army; for, sir, since man has been known and history has been written wars have occurred. Some have occurred that we could not see good reason for; yet they have occurred; and a great government like this should at least, as I said, have an army that would make it look respectable before the nations of the earth as well as at home.

Indian wars have ceased, and I am glad of it. I hope we shall never have another; but as was well said by the Senator from Vermont, if our Army had been larger and more efficient in the West at the time of our troubles with the Shoshones and the Sioux and the Apaches and the Mescalero Apaches and the other Indians, I think those wars would have ceased much sooner between the whites and the Indians. They have ceased now, and I hope they will not be renewed.

But there is one reason that the Senator does not seem perhaps to have examined very closely. An army in time of peace is not an army to make war upon anybody. An army in time of peace is a mere police establishment, for the purpose of being ready at a moment's warning to perform the duties that are required of them by the Government against invasion, encroachment upon our rights by Indians, or those who may make war upon our people. Now, because we are at peace, there is just as much reason existing to-day for an army, not of magnitude, not of one hundred thousand, but such an army as would be sufficient at least to meet on our borders any attempt that might be made by any other power to invade or assault us in any way whatever, as there ever was. I suppose we are in no danger, as the Senator said; or suppose we are in less danger now than ever; grant that to be true, I want to know why, then, it is that members of the Naval Committee are introducing propositions to make immense guns? Why is it that our Ordnance Committee are making reports to have fortifications built all around our coast? Why is that? Whence the necessity? We are at peace with all the nations of the earth. If there is to be no more war, why these great preparations? If we knew there never would be war, of course the preparations would be unnecessary; but want of knowledge on our part in that direction induces us to do what? Induces us to make preparations for what? For our own protection and self-preservation as a government, as all other governments do.

We find standing armies in some of the European nations of five hundred thousand or even seven hundred thousand men. I should hate very much to see an army of that kind again in this country. We do not need it. But when we find an army of five hundred thousand ready to be transported and marched against a government at peace with all the world, as we are to-day, it does seem to me that at least we ought to have a nucleus around which we could form a great army for our own protection and preservation.

The bill proposes to add to the Army five thousand men. These are not officers, they are men to be enlisted as soldiers. It will require that many men to make the framework of our Army an army at all. It is not an army to-day, except in name. You find a captain and two lieutenants commanding twenty men. The truth is that in the condition our Army is in to-day the officers are almost ashamed to bring their companies out and exhibit them in the presence of the American people. It reduces the efficiency of the Army, the efficiency of the company, of the battalion, of the regiment, and of the officers. No officer who is a captain of a company, when he is entitled to sixty or one hundred men, is going to be proud of a company of twenty men. I have never in my life seen one that was. If his company was reduced in battle to the number of twenty, he might be proud then of the prowess of those men who met with misfortune; but when they are reduced by desertion, or when they are reduced because of a refusal on the part of Congress to fill up these fragments of companies and regiments, then he is not proud.

Sir, either reduce your officers and the number of your regiments and put them together, or make a good company, a good battalion, and a good regiment, by filling up the companies and making them what the law contemplates they should be. The law provides that there shall be so many men in each company, so many men in each regiment, but after the regiments are organized and the companies are organized Congress says, "You shall not recruit above so many; you shall not recruit the Army above twenty-five thousand." Twenty-two thousand we had it for a while in some of the appropriation bills. When Congress says that, then, although the law says you shall have so many men in a company, Congress says, "Yes, you can have them in a company on paper; you can call it a company, but we do not propose that you shall recruit it up beyond so many." Therefore, you have no company and can not have it, because Congress will not appropriate the money to recruit it. We have cut it down by a provision in an appropriation bill and keep it at twenty-five thousand, although we have a framework of companies enough in this country to make an Army of forty thousand or fifty thousand men, and a good one, too. But you reduce it down so that each captain of a company has a little fragment of men, and when you call on a company to go out after Indians how many men do you get? If it is composed of a company, there may be forty men. You have one man detailed for this purpose, another man for that purpose. They have got to do all their own work; some men are detailed for cooks, some detailed for one thing and some for another, some to drive teams and ambulances, and when you get your details made and you go to marshal your company how many men have you? You will see a captain march out with about fifteen men. One of the lieutenants says "I do not want to go; there is nothing for me to command." The captain will say to the other, "Here, you are second lieutenant, and this being about a squad, you go on with them," and the other two stay at home because they are ashamed to go out in the field with that number. Yet you call that the Army of the United States, something to talk of the people being proud of as their Army!

The Senator speaks of the gallantry of the officers. Nobody discredits the officers. I am as proud of our officers and our soldiers as anybody, but I am not willing to put them in a condition where you yourself, sir, if you to-day were to go with an officer of any government on earth, even of little Mexico down below us, the weak republic, and were to see a regiment of theirs by the side of one of ours, would be ashamed of our own organization. I have seen, within the last two years, the organization of the Mexican army on our frontier, with their regiments full and their companies full, and our officers were absolutely ashamed to muster their own men.

Mr. HALE. Would not the Senator prefer to take his chances in battle with five or ten of our regiments, such as they are, as he describes them, rather than take the chances with ten full Mexican regiments?

Mr. LOGAN. I never commanded any Mexican regiments, and never expect to.

Mr. HALE. You have faced them.

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, I have been on the other side when we were engaged in that unpleasantness, and I have no desire to make comparisons of that kind. I would rather command American troops than any troops on earth. But that does not argue that a regiment of one hundred men will compare in appearance with a regiment of a thousand men when you bring them up on dress parade to exhibit them or to show what they are made of.

I have been in different forts in this country when in the evening the troops were brought out on dress parade in order that I might see the efficiency of our organization. Well, bring out five companies, say a battalion. You would have a colonel, a lieutenant-colonel, a major, and officers enough to command a brigade, and what would you see? I would stand there by the side of the colonel, and I would see a company come out, as the band played, on the double-quick, and at trail arms stand up in line and count them, forty men in the first company. They bring the largest company first to make the best show. The next that comes out has about thirty; the last company that comes on the left flank of the regiment would have from ten to fifteen, and the officers would stay back in their quarters. That is the condition of the Army.

Do you want it that way? Does anybody desire it that way? Does anybody want that kind of an Army of the United States? You go and ask General Sheridan, who is in command of the Army, or General Sherman, who has been retired, or any of these officers in reference to this Army, and they will tell you of its lack of efficiency to-day because it is a mere framework. There are no men. They are scattered in companies enough to make fifty thousand men, and here you have twenty-five thousand.

Mr. HALE. Now, let me ask the Senator, who is authority on military matters——

Mr. LOGAN. No; I do not claim to be by any means.

Mr. HALE. It is conceded by all of us. Is it not admitted that in time of peace our Army is to a great degree a skeleton organization? That is, nobody expects it to be filled up; nobody expects that the companies will be full to the limit that the law allows, or that upon parade, or that upon show they will display as finely as they would in war when the ranks are full. I understand that that is the theory on which we maintain our military establishment—that the companies are meager undoubtedly; they are not full because not needed, and the only question—for they will remain unfilled whether you have thirty thousand or twenty-five thousand—thirty thousand will not fill up the companies, thirty thousand will not make them all full regiments, will not make them so that they will appear as they would if they were full. Thirty-five thousand will not do it. The only question is for the real needs and duties of the service whether any more men are needed in the Army. I do not agree with the Senator. He thinks they are needed. I do not. I do not think his argument that the regiments and the companies ought to be filled up is maintainable here now, because he does not propose to fill them up.

Mr. LOGAN. Now I will reply to the Senator and state exactly what I think about it. I do not think five thousand additional men will fill up the companies to the full requirement of the law, of course not; but that addition will make them at least look like companies, and it will not only do that, but it will make a better organization, a better army.

When the Senator talks about the framework of an army in time of trouble what does he mean? Does he not know that whenever a war exists between this country and any other, or between any countries, no matter what they are, the army, unless it is a full organization, becomes a reorganization, and that the older officers generally go to the rear and the younger ones go to the front? Is not that so? Then what does he mean by saying that you will keep these and let these men grow old—for that is the meaning of it—merely lying around forts, &c., and then when war comes there will be no efficiency in our Army and you have to get a new set. My idea is to fill it up somewhat so that the younger officers in the Army will take a pride in their profession. Instead of resigning and going into other business they will have a pride in their profession because they have something to command.

Now let me call the Senator's attention to one thing. I hear a great deal of talk about the fisheries of this country and about our agreement with foreign countries on the subject of the fisheries, and suggestions that trouble may grow out of the subject some of these days; that some time Canada may take a notion to raise a row of some kind. I believe there is a fort or fortress in the Senator's State of Maine.

Mr. HALE. Several.

Mr. LOGAN. Fort Preble is quite a prominent fort in Maine, is it not?

Mr. HALE. At Portland Harbor.

Mr. LOGAN. One of the great harbors of this country; a fine one, too, in front of a beautiful city. Suppose that some Canadian craft or some of the Canadians up there some day should take a notion with five or six hundred men to run down to Fort Preble, what would you do?

Mr. HALE. I do not think they would ever get there.

Mr. LOGAN. How would you stop them?

Mr. HALE. I think the people would stop them.

Mr. LOGAN. The people! You rely on the people outside? Here you have at Fort Preble six officers and thirty-nine enlisted men, making forty-five in all, officers and men, to man Fort Preble against Canada, England, and all Europe, and yet the gentleman would rather see the Army reduced than increased. I would like to give you a few men up there at Fort Preble.

Mr. HALE. Let me tell the Senator what I think about that. There is Fort Preble, an old fortification. It has not much of a garrison. The Senator supposes that a few hundred men would start from Canada and run down there 150 miles. Now a few hundred men never could get to Fort Preble, whether we had an army or not. Neither do I believe that the garrisoning of Fort Preble, or any fort on our coast, would in any degree depend upon whether you add five thousand to the Army now or not. The trouble would not come in that way. The forts would not be garrisoned by the regular Army.

Mr. LOGAN. Not, the Senator thinks, if the people of Maine would lick the Canadians before they got to the fort. I agree to that. Then on that argument we do not want any army at all.

Mr. HALE. Not very much.

Mr. LOGAN. Then why not wipe it all out? If you wipe out part, wipe it all out. If you are going to depend on the people of the country, depend on them altogether. We have plenty of men who can take command all over the country, men of experience, there is no trouble about that; and what is the need of any army at all? If you are for wiping out the whole Army and relying on the people themselves, that is one thing; if you are in favor of keeping an army, that is another thing. If you are in favor of keeping an army, keep it at least in decent shape.

There are several matters in connection with this bill that I will not discuss except as they come up, for I do not wish to detain the Senate; but, so far as this proposition is concerned, I insist on the Senator from Maine going now—not at this moment, but I mean before this bill passes—to the Secretary of War and the General of the Army and asking them what they think about it. As I said, if the General will say there is no necessity for this, I will strike it out of the bill without any further argument or discussion in reference to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well; but before anything further is done I ask that the Senate agree that this bill may continue in the morning hour until disposed of. I think we can dispose of it in another morning. There is no other point to delay us.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the pending bill during the morning hour to-morrow? The Chair hears no objection, and that order will be made.

RELATIONS BETWEEN THE SENATE AND EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolutions reported by Mr. EDMUNDS from the Committee on the Judiciary February 18, expressing the sense of the Senate on the refusal of the Attorney-General to send copies of certain papers.

Mr. COLQUITT. Mr. President, it was my purpose to discuss the subject at some length with respect to the constitutional power of the President of the United States to make removals. I shall not do so now. It would be superfluous after the very able and exhaustive speeches to which we have listened upon that point. If it is possible for a question to be settled, it seems to me this one should be regarded as settled. From the legislative interpretation in 1789, sustained as that interpretation was by such men as Madison and Boudinot and Charles Carroll and Gouverneur Morris, sustained as they have been in their views by commentators and chancellors and judges and historians and by Attorneys-General of the United States, including such men as Wirt, Legaré, and Cushing, and followed in practice by fifteen Presidents of the United States in their administrations, it would seem that if it was possible to graft any question upon public sentiment and upon the deliberations of a public body, this long continuance in vindicating the power of the President of the United States to make removals would be sufficient to establish and forever put it at rest.

Reference has been made to the opinions of three of the ablest men who ever adorned the halls of the Senate or of any parliamentary body in the world, Mr. Clay, Mr. Webster, and Mr. Calhoun. They have been referred to time and again as furnishing the very highest evidence for denying the right and the power of this authority, as it is claimed, to rest in the President of the United States.

For forty years from 1789 this question was regarded as settled; it slept for that period. In the celebrated contest between the Senate and Andrew Jackson, then President of the United States, Mr. Clay, Mr. Calhoun, and Mr. Webster reawakened discussion on the subject. They undertook by their combined efforts to overturn the construction which had been put on the Constitution in the past, and if there could be champions of any cause able to bring to it the approval of a listening Senate, that cause might have been won when it was advocated by three such men as these. But grand as were their powers, superhuman almost in their gifts and attainments, coming from different sections of this country, representing different constituencies, they failed utterly to shake the confidence of the people and of the deliberative bodies of this country in the correctness of the interpretation which had been made in the early days of the Republic. It ought to be a warning to the leading men of this day. If such men as Clay and Webster and Calhoun yielded to the intrinsic power of truth, though they were confronted by men of less ability yet were compelled to yield their adhesion to this principle, it would seem to be a warning to the leaders of this day that they are making a futile attempt to have another doubt put upon this constitutional power. I know of no reason for such a doubt, unless it may be the zeal of modern statesmanship by men who imagine that they have made discoveries which escaped the blunt sagacity of the founders of the Republic.

During the debate in these Halls some of the remarks which have been uttered in this Chamber have been in the way of ridicule and sarcasm with respect to the declaration made in a circular of one of the heads of Departments referring to "offensive partisanship." It seems that these are words which can be played upon and made jest of, as though it was a very extraordinary expression, as though it was a new idea of new men in a new administration—the crude conception of unfledged statesmanship. Why, sir, it is not a new idea. It is not a new suggestion. In the discussion which occurred here for month after month in 1835 it was repeatedly declared upon this floor by men who were then assailing General Jackson, as well as by those who were vindicating and sustaining him, time and again was the suggestion made, that it would be good policy on the part of that administration, as well as of all administrations, that they should adopt this as a fixed policy, that offensive partisanship should be a reason for the removal of officers from their places. The reference here made to Mr. Webster recalls it, for I want to read what he said on that identical subject, and I do this because I wish to put an end to these taunts. No arguments have I yet heard with respect to the principle that is involved in the idea, but merely sneers and a contemptuous turn of the nose whenever reference has been made to "offensive partisanship," as though that was the especial point of weakness in this administration and they intended to assail that. I say it is not a new idea. It has not only been argued and discussed in various ways, but it has been embodied as a rule and a regulation in the Departments of this Government previous to this administration. March 20, 1841, from the Department of State, Mr. Webster issued this circular by direction of the President of the United States:

He therefore directs that information be given to all officers and agents in your department of the public service that partisan interference in popular elections, whether of State officers or officers of this Government, and for whomsoever or against whomsoever it may be exercised, or the payment of any contribution or assessment on salaries or official compensation for party or election purposes, will be regarded by him as cause of removal.

That would seem as though it had a prospective bearing merely, but it was retroactive, for Mr. Webster and the President acted on that circular and removed men from office because of their active interference in the political affairs of that day.

I come down to a more recent period with a view to refer to a law and a regulation that now stands unrepealed and is the law and the regulation of the Departments of this Government, though it does not seem to have been regarded or followed. I refer to an order issued during the administration of Mr. Hayes. And here let me say, though it may not be in the line of the remarks that are pertinent to this question, that, whatever may be said with regard to Mr. Hayes and his administration or the manner by which he was inaugurated President of the United States, I do not believe there has been an administration since the war that has done more to restore the autonomy of these States and the right of self-government than the administration of Mr. Hayes. I am aware that such a declaration coming from a Southern Democrat may damn Mr. Hayes with Republicans and it may damn me with Democrats; but I trust, sir, that I shall never be so blinded by prejudice or by party infatuation that I can see nothing in the character or the conduct of an adversary but his faults. It was during his administration that this order was passed, which was sent to all the Departments:

POSTAL OFFICERS FORBIDDEN TO PARTICIPATE IN POLITICAL CAMPAIGNS, ETC.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, June 22, 1877.

SIR: I desire to call your attention to the following paragraph in a letter addressed by me to the Secretary of the Treasury on the conduct to be observed by officers of the General Government in relation to the elections:

"No officer should be required or permitted to take part in the management of political organizations, caucuses, conventions, or election campaigns. Their right to vote and to express their views on public questions, either orally or through the press, is not denied, provided it does not interfere with the discharge of their official duties. No assessment for political purposes on officers or subordinates should be allowed."

This rule is applicable to every department of the civil service. It should be understood by every officer of the General Government that he is expected to conform his conduct to its requirements.

Very respectfully,

R. B. HAYES.

To the POSTMASTER-GENERAL.

I shall not stop to inquire whether or not it has been observed in the administration of the officers that he appointed or that were appointed by his successor in the administration of this Government, but it establishes this fact, that discipline was prescribed against partisan action by office-holders; and it shows that this idea, now held up to contempt in this body, the idea of offensive partisanship being objectionable, is not new, but has been established in the previous policy and administration of this Government. What I have just read is the law of the Executive Departments this day. It will constitute a part of the revised and republished edition of the Postal Laws and Regulations which will be laid on our desks in a few days. It there stands. And yet we are told that for this administration to consider the question as to whether a man has been an "offensive partisan" is an infringement of the individual rights of the citizen!

What is an "offensive partisan?" I have no doubt that the administration has had evidences and letters of what constitutes the offense. I intend to give two or three, so that it may be seen by the country whether or not this administration, in acting upon the fact that men are "offensive partisans" or not, is transcending the limits of the propriety of official duty. I have here a letter which will in some measure show what is meant by offensive partisanship. It is a letter addressed to the honorable the Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C., February 11, 1885. I shall not give names for reasons that will be obvious to gentlemen who hear me; but as to this letter, I vouch for its identity. A complaint was made to the Secretary of the Treasury that this man had been absent from his office and had not been diligent in the discharge of its duties, and in respons- to that charge he writes to the Secretary of the Treasury:

I will state that having been appointed to this office by the President without my knowledge directly or indirectly nearly three years ago, my first intimation being a telegram that my name had been sent to the Senate, and learning from the parties who had thus caused my nomination to be made without my knowledge that it was an appointment looking to political operations in the then approaching campaign of 1884, with a view to improving my political usefulness I accepted the office. In accepting it I had little thought of secluding myself within it, for such a course would have conflicted with the entire programme of myself and friends who had so kindly placed me here. We then had a political "programme" running from the time of my appointment through to the close of 1884, and that programme absolutely precluded the idea of my sticking closely down in this office.

I was appointed to this office in March, 1882, and took charge in April, and in June, or perhaps late in May, I went to Washington, D. C., and remained there two months on part of the political work had in view at the time of my appointment. That absence was sanctioned by the then Secretary of the Treasury, who well understood the object of my presence in Washington.

* * * * * * * *

I remained in Washington as the best point to work up our "programme," and during the two months I remained there I conducted perhaps the most extensive personal correspondence ever carried on from that city with persons composing the body as well as leaders of the Republican party in their State—in fact, during the two months I came into close communication by letter with almost every Republican in the State of any local influence whatever, writing, with the aid of hecktographs, thousands of letters.

* * * * * * *

To the average Republican * * * a letter from Washington has more force than one written from ——, and I utilized that fact in the good work in which I was so warmly enlisted and in relation to which so much was expected of me. Having, as I believed, done all I could do by correspondence from Washington city, I transferred myself to the State to look after the approaching conventions in the respective Congressional districts and the State convention—for the chief work to be done under the long-cherished "programme" was then at hand. Giving close attention to these conventions and but little personal attention to my office (for I had a good man at each desk) we soon rounded them up with twenty-four votes solid for the person of our choice.

* * * * * * *

Yes, I was frequently absent, and doubtless appeared to be neglecting my official duties while pushing onward with our "programme." Though not a delegate to Chicago I was there, and had much to do with keeping our delegation a unit, and though the Chicago part of our "programme" was a disastrous failure, that failure could not be laid to us, for our delegation stood a unit, "as solid as a rock wall," "twenty-four votes for Arthur."

I will state here, that I may not arouse trouble in the watchful and jealous soul of the Senator from Vermont, that this letter was not obtained from the Department, directly or indirectly.

I read two or three of these letters for this specific purpose—that it may be seen what, in the exercise of the authority of removal or suspension by the President of the United States when he, or the Postmaster-General, who has been so frequently referred to as using this term "offensive partisanship," is meant by "offensive partisanship," and to show that these gentlemen would be reckless to their duties unless they suspended or removed such men from office, as they had the power to do. I read from another case.

This is the report of an inspector in relation to an officer in one of the States.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF POST-OFFICE INSPECTOR,
Cincinnati, Ohio, May 29, 1883.

SIR: I herewith return case 24089 C, and I have the honor to report that, in obedience to instructions with the case, I visited New Lexington, Perry County, Ohio, and after an investigation and careful inventory find the financial condition of the office at close of business May 19 to be as follows:

Total to account for May 7		$942 52
By stamps, envelopes, &c., on hand May 19	$442 34
By cash on hand, postal funds	101 01
		543 35
		399 17
Money-order account:
To balance May 19	$125 16
By cash on hand May 19	92
		124 74
Total shortage		523 91

The total shortage on money-order and postal account being, as above shown, $523.91.

This amount I demanded, and was informed by Mr. —— that he had not one cent whereby to repay the amount.

Chief Inspector, Washington, D. C.

On my arrival at the post-office at New Lexington, Ohio, and after making my business known to the postmaster, Mr. ——, he confessed to me that he was short in his postal account, and thinking the amount to be about $300, and thereafter, consulting with one of his assistants, he informed me that the money-order account was short, and this account was in fact, as I found it, entirely out of funds.

Mr. —— admits to me that he has known of the shortage in his office, but the amount shown by the inventory was larger than he had imagined. Also he confesses to me that the shortage is accounted for and is due to the fact of his having used the funds for some time past in conduct of his private business, and that a visit of an inspector was not a matter of surprise to him.

I find that Mr. —— has not only used for his private business the postal and money-order funds on hand in his office, but that in several instances he has drawn orders on Columbus, Ohio, with which to pay private indebtedness, and constantly failed to place in the office at New Lexington the money in repayment for said orders.

My investigation also elicits the fact that, in violation of Postal Laws, section 118, Mr. —— has been in the habit of exchanging stamps for merchandise, this violation extending back to 1879.

This man, with this shameful record, was recommended to be retained in office by the leading politicians of the Republican party because his services were regarded as important for the success of his party. He was dismissed under a Republican administration, but upon these recommendations of his value to his party he was reinstated by that administration, which was some years before this letter was written.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question? I have not interfered in this debate, and I do not know that I shall do so. That officer I suppose was suspended, was he not?

Mr. COLQUITT. He was not suspended. He will be suspended as soon as there is assurance that a substitute for him will be confirmed.

Mr. LOGAN. I supposed he was suspended; if not, the Postmaster-General has not done his duty. Is that a record you are reading from?

Mr. COLQUITT. Yes, sir.

Mr. LOGAN. From the Post-Office Department?

Mr. COLQUITT. Yes, sir, and it is open to any Senator in this body.

Mr. LOGAN. The only reason I ask the question was that it struck me as strange that records should be furnished against individuals to gentlemen to make speeches from, and that they can not be furnished on a resolution of the Senate.

Mr. COLQUITT. I will assure the Senator from Illinois that he can have any record in the Post-Office Department if he wishes and will go there and apply for it. Any Senator can do so. He can have any document or any paper, especially of an official character, because this is on file.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the honorable Senator from Georgia if he means to be understood that documents of this character in regard to charges against officers are furnished when the officials are guilty and not when the official is innocent?

Mr. COLQUITT. I suppose you can get all you want. I have no doubt you can get those that are for him as well as those that are against him.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator be good enough to explain what is the principle on which these things are given out? They seem to be denied to a resolution of the Senate.

Mr. COLQUITT. Oh, no; they have never been denied. I have authority for saying, which has been repeated to me time and again by the heads of these Departments, that no Senator in this body has ever been denied access to papers in the Departments.

Mr. HOAR. But I understand——

Mr. COLQUITT. They have refused to respond to a call made by the Senate as a matter of right to demand them, but they have never been refused to the inspection of any man.

Mr. HOAR. The President of the United States says in his recent message that the Departments have been plied with requests from individual Senators and from committees of the body, and now from the Senate, and he proceeds to state his reasons why those documents shall not be disclosed. This is the first time I have ever heard of the consent of the Departments to exhibit them to individual Senators except Senators on that side, and I have heard of a good many refusals.

Mr. COLQUITT. I expect the Senator from Massachusetts has never applied or he would have found out.

Mr. HOAR. I have never applied.

Mr. COLQUITT. There is no reason therefore why the Senator should stand here and say they are denied.

Mr. HOAR. But I am a member of a committee that has applied.

Mr. COLQUITT. Of course I acknowledge that, but it is upon a different ground entirely; they deny that the Senate in its official capacity or through a committee has a right to demand papers or direct that they be sent here—papers of a very different character from these. They may have been refused; but all papers of this character, and I doubt not all papers of every character, will be open to the inspection of gentlemen who seek to know what is in them, but they are declined to be furnished upon the ground which is the true ground, that this Senate in its capacity as a Senate has no right to demand correspondence of a private and confidential character relating to removals from office.

Mr. LOGAN. Well, I should like to ask the Senator, if they are furnished to an individual to be read and published to the country, if that is not exactly what the Senate has been trying to get at? Why should they be given to an individual and not to the Senate? That is the point I can not with my obtuseness understand; it is a distinction I can not really get through my head.

Mr. COLQUITT. It has been understood in the past, I will say to the Senator from Illinois. General Jackson understood it, and it was practiced during his administration. I have no doubt it has been understood by other administrations and practiced by them. There is nothing mysterious in it that I can see. The discrimination that is drawn between the demand of the Senate in one shape here by reason of a resolution, and the review of papers by a Senator who goes there, which is granted to him as a matter of courtesy, is very evident. The things are very different matters.

Mr. LOGAN. There is this difference: Suppose some Senators do not go there and they would like to see the papers too. I do not go to any of the Departments and ask for papers. I never have done so, and I do not expect to do so; but I might like to see them. If we in our aggregate capacity as a Senate pass a resolution respectfully requesting them and they shall be denied, I am really afraid that the country will not see the distinction that is made when the Departments give them to members to bring them here to be read in order to condemn somebody. I am afraid they will not see the difference. I should like very much that they should, because if there is a distinction I should like the people to know it. I can not see it myself.

Mr. COLQUITT. I regret very much indeed that the Senator can not see it, a thing that has been so obvious to so many people and to so many officers of the Departments and to so many gentlemen who have been as high in position here in representing their States as the Senator is.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly, it is strange, I have no doubt, but still I can not see it.

Mr. COLQUITT. I am not responsible for that. I refer to these papers with a view to illustrate this matter of offensive partisanship, and to show that in the exercise of the power of suspension or of removal, one or the other or both, the President or the head of each of these Departments with such cases as this had a right, and it was their duty, to say that in such cases of offensive partisanship they would use their authority and suspend or dismiss from office. And yet in such cases, when the matter of offensive partisanship is referred to here, Senators rise from their seats and with a mournful earnestness and rounded periods and violent gesticulation pronounce homilies upon the sacred and inalienable rights of the citizen and upon the bleeding wounds of the Constitution—the sacred and inalienable rights of such characters as have been illustrated in the correspondence to which I have referred!

I omitted to say that while the paper last read indicates that there was some malfeasance in office, though I would not mention the name of the correspondent of the first paper, it is due to him to say that there was nothing wrong in his office, that every dollar was accounted for. He is a Republican, was a Republican then, and is a Republican now, a bold man, a fearless man, and a man who despises shams and pretenses; and hence he did not conceal the fact that he held the office, and he was ready to avow it to anybody, for political party purposes, and that he worked out the programme under it and secured 24 solid votes for Arthur. Recognizing the fact that he was a partisan and having no sympathy with the Democratic administration, he felt it due to his own honor and self-respect that he should resign.

But, sir, I have been drawn aside from the main purpose of my remarks to-day. I wish to call the serious attention of the Senate to the matter that we have to act upon. After all our speeches are made, after the question is exhausted, after the Constitution is analyzed, and after precedents have been furnished, when all this is done, most of them relating to the exercise of this power by the President, at last when we come to act as a Senate we shall have to act by voice and vote on the resolutions of the Judiciary Committee; and it is to those resolutions that I wish to call the serious attention of the Senate. The first resolution reads as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate hereby expresses its condemnation of the refusal of the Attorney-General, under whatever influence, to send to the Senate copies of papers called for by its resolution of the 25th of January and set forth in the report of the Committee on the Judiciary as in violation of his official duty and subversive of the fundamental principles of the Government and of a good administration thereof.

I wish to ask if the majority of the Senate is prepared to vote "yea" upon that resolution? Is the majority of the Senate prepared to virtually impeach a high official of this Government? Does a majority of the Senate intend to usurp the power of impeachment by pronouncing a judgment of conviction upon a high official before he has ever been tried? The passage of this resolution may be regarded and referred to very flippantly and very lightly, but there is not an official nor a citizen of this country who does not feel that to him it is a serious matter when he is assailed in his character either as an individual or as an official. In this instance, this condemnation is to be made, and why? Does it accomplish any legislative purpose? Does it remedy the evil? Is it a warning even to those who may come after him?

No, Mr. President, there is but one object, if there be any object at all, and that is to perpetuate the malice and immortalize the animosity of a partisan majority by placing this judgment upon the enduring records of the Senate, to be handed down to the latest generation. It is a virtual impeachment. The language of this resolution seems to me to have been taken identically from the language used by the managers in the case of the impeachment of Andrew Johnson upon this floor, when Mr. Butler, speaking for the managers, declared what was an impeachable offense. Mr. Butler said in that trial:

We define an impeachable offense or high crime and misdemeanor to be one in its nature or consequence subversive of some fundamental or essential principle of Government.

That is almost identically the language of this resolution, and those managers, comprising the most talented and the most gifted men of the House of Representatives, defined an impeachable offense to mean one that involves conduct subversive of the fundamental principles of the Government. Yet the Senate, without any articles of impeachment furnished, as is required by the Constitution of the United States, seeks to try and condemn by this resolution one of the high officials of this country, either the Attorney-General or, over his back, the President of the United States.

Has the Senate this power? The Constitution says that the House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment; and the Constitution says the Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments; but the Senate now usurps the power to make articles of impeachment and to try them, becoming both the accusers and the judges. In the House of Representatives there has not been a man who has ever risen from his seat with a view to propose articles of impeachment. In that body, composed of young and ardent men, who you would think might be excessive in their passion and in their party feeling and sentiment, there has not been a man to rise and prefer articles of impeachment, but it is left to this body of "grave and reverend seigniors," actuated, I fear, by feelings of partisanship, both to file articles of impeachment and to pass upon them with its judgment.

It is well enough for us to pause as a Senate. The Senate has no such power; and whenever it steps outside of its legitimate and constitutional duty with a view to impeach the character of a high official, it is a usurpation for which, if the Senate were put on trial by some higher tribunal, it would itself be condemned.

We hear nothing from anybody who represents the people about the impeachment of these men or that they have been guilty of conduct subversive of the Constitution of the United States and subversive of all good government. If the President or the Attorney-General had been guilty of conspiracy, if either had been conducting a correspondence with a view to overthrow this Government and to usurp its powers and to place them in the hands of some despot, the language describing the offense could not be more emphatic and stronger than that used in this resolution, which declares that the Attorney-General and the President, for the President is aimed at when it says "under whatever influence," are charged with an attempt to subvert the fundamental principles of this Government. Although the Senate is composed of representatives of the States, not representing the popular voice of the country, but assuming that they are the guardians especially of the popular rights of this day and that they intend therefore to subserve the purpose of preserving this Government from this sort of assault, while the President of the United States and the House of Representatives, with shorter terms, more directly responsible to the people, elected by the popular vote of the people, they themselves standing in harmony with a majority of the people of this country, yet the Senate is to stand here and upon a virtual article of impeachment declare that the President of the United States or his Attorney-General, one or both, are guilty of conduct subversive of the fundamental principles of this Government.

And Senators are elected by Legislatures of States some of which are by the popular vote Democratic, as in the case of New York with a Democratic popular majority, represented by two Republican Senators, or New Jersey with a popular Democratic majority with one Republican and one Democrat in the Senate, or Indiana in the same attitude; and yet the Senate feels that it has an obligation resting upon it to represent the rights of the people and protect the people against the assaults of the President of the United States, who is the leading representative of the people, and to usurp the power and the authority of the House of Representatives, that has just come fresh from the bosom of the people, representing their views.

Mr. Alexander Hamilton, who ought to be very good authority for the latitudinarians of this day, said:

The division of the powers of impeachment between the two branches of the Legislature, assigning to one the right of accusing and to the other the right of trying, avoids the inconvenience of making the same persons both accusers and judges, and guards against the danger of persecution from the prevalency of a factious spirit in either of those branches.

There was no question at the time that the articles of the Constitution were adopted that was more delicate than the question as to where the trial of impeachment cases should rest. They would not allow it to rest in the judges of the Supreme Court, for that was one body; they would not allow it to rest with the House of Representatives, because that was a single body, or with the Senate of the United States; but they divided the power in order to protect the high officials of this country from the factious spirit that might at times become prevalent and overrunning and overruling the rights of men when wild with their own party passion; and is it not well that they divided it between the House of Representatives and the Senate of the United States? But at this day, for party purposes—can we say that it is anything else—the Senate is to assume the right and the power and the constitutional duty to pass upon a resolution that in its moral effect upon the character of the administration, upon the character of the Attorney-General and the President, is as great as though it was a real impeachment?

The Constitution intended that the Senate of the United States should be the most elevated parliamentary body upon the face of the earth. The age of its members, their dignity, their eminence, and their large experience were supposed to be the surest guarantees that they would not be the subjects of overwrought passion and partisan resentment, but listening to the discussions of this day a stranger seated in the galleries, a thoughtful observer would suppose that the Senate had fallen from its high estate and that in its debates it had not reached beyond the dignity of a political junta.

This proceeding is justified upon the ground that the Attorney-General has refused papers to the Judiciary Committee that might explain the conduct and the management of the office held as district attorney of the southern district of Alabama. It sounded very plausible when I listened the other day to the mournful earnestness of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] as to what an outrage it was to be refused the papers that might show how an officer had behaved himself; that those papers would illustrate the conduct and management of an office; and that it was important to the Union and important to the general interests of the country that the conduct and management of the office should be known; and he was indignant at the idea that papers and documents are refused to be furnished to illustrate the conduct and the manner in which the duties of the office were discharged. That is the plea. I do not mean to insinuate in this discussion that there is any lack of sincerity in these professions, for I impugn the motives of no one, nor do I attribute to any one improper motives, but I look to the face of the resolution. The Senator from Vermont in the resolution of inquiry adopted by the Senate January 25, on his motion, says:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General of the United States be, and he hereby is, directed to transmit to the Senate copies of all documents and papers that have been filed in the Department of Justice since the 1st day of January, A. D. 1885, in relation to the management and conduct of the office of district attorney of the United States of the southern district of Alabama.

Sir, if the Attorney-General had responded and given every paper, if he had concealed nothing, if he had given every letter, private, confidential, official, and unofficial, in response to this resolution, the Senator from Vermont could have formed no idea in relation to the conduct and management of this office, and why? Because he called for papers filed since the 1st day of January, 1885, just two months preceding the inauguration of the present Executive of the United States. This gentleman had been in office for nearly four years. He does not ask for the papers and documents covering the period of three years and a half, but only for the period of a few brief months just previous to the inauguration of the President of the United States.

Mr. GEORGE. Two months.

Mr. COLQUITT. For two months and three days just previous to the inauguration of President Cleveland he calls for papers that have been filed in order to show what was the conduct and management of this office. If he had been intent upon knowing what had been the conduct and management of the office would he not have covered the entire period during which the man had discharged the duties of the office? Why confine it and limit it to the 1st day of January, 1885? Why not include all the past while he was in office? If the Senator was impelled by that grand and patriotic purpose to know everything that might relate to the prosperity of the Union and the States, would not the resolution have covered the entire period of the administration of the office?

The papers were never called for that related to any period previous to the election of President Cleveland. Not a document, not a paper was asked for, and yet it was important, to conserve the interests of the entire Union, in the language of the Senator from Vermont, that the Senate should have these papers. Not a paper was asked for that covers the main part of the administration of this officer. I shall not say that it was designedly put so; I shall leave that to future developments. I know nothing in regard to the facts in the case, nor as to whether there was anything in the conduct of this office which would show that this man was guilty of fraud or malfeasance. That may have been the case. I shall not assume that the Senator from Vermont knew or that the Judiciary Committee knew. I only argue from the singularity of this declaration upon the face of this resolution that it means one thing, and they profess that they have in view the accomplishment of another thing; and because the Attorney-General refused to furnish those papers and documents he is to be virtually impeached by the Senate!

Is it not a little singular for a great body of elderly men, charged with grave legislative responsible duties, that they can reconcile it to their consciences and to their sense of duty to pass such a resolution as this in face of all the facts that precede it and in face of the precedents that may be furnished in relation to the same object? Is it with a view to rebuke the conduct of the Attorney-General in refusing this information that this resolution is to be passed? I ask Senators upon the other side of the Chamber if they are sincere in their declaration that they think it is best to rebuke him? Why is it that in a similar case, when a Republican was at the head of one of the Departments, when a distinguished member of this body was then the Secretary of the Treasury, he refused in broader and more emphatic terms than have been used by any head of a Department of the Government under the present administration, and yet not a voice was raised here nor a resolution of condemnation with a view to punish him or to hold him up to public reprobation?

I shall refer to the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, which was used a few days ago by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA] with a view to illustrate a different matter. I shall not attempt to add to or take away from the very able speech which the Senator from West Virginia made; it would mar its beauty and symmetry; but I use it in a different line, and for a different purpose, from that which he had in view. I do not refer to it to show the inconsistency of Mr. SHERMAN, but to show the inconsistency of the Republican representatives upon this floor if they should pass this resolution. From the Committee on Commerce there went this inquiry to the Secretary of the Treasury:

COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE, UNITED STATES SENATE,
November 15, 1877.

SIR: The Committee on Commerce having had referred to it an executive message, presenting for the advice and consent of the Senate the question of removing Chester A. Arthur and appointing in his stead Theodore Rosevelt as collector of the port of New York, I am instructed by the committee to request you to transmit to it for its information, and for the information of the Senate, such papers as may exist bearing upon the expediency or inexpediency of the proposed change.

Now, then, what papers?

Be pleased to send in particular all papers of the following description, addressed to the President or to the Hon. John Sherman, Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.

That covers the suggestion which was made by the Senator from Vermont that every paper of that character addressed to either of those gentlemen officially is an official paper and is not confidential:

First. Petitions or communications asking or advising the removal of the present collector.

Second. All communications asking or advising the retention of the present collector, or remonstrating against his removal.

Third. Any charges of personal or official misconduct against the present collector.

Fourth. Any communication to the present collector from or by direction of the President or the Secretary of the Treasury wherein he has been censured or notified that any act of his was disapproved, and also his answer thereto.

Fifth. Any correspondence, telegraphic or otherwise, with the present incumbent touching his vacation of the office of collector.

Sixth. The recommendations on which Mr. Rosevelt was nominated.

If any oral charge has been made against Mr. Arthur, or if any reprehensible or insubordinate act of his has been discovered, the committee asks to be fully apprised in regard to it.

The committee wishes any other fact or facts you may be able to furnish bearing upon the proposed change; and also the date and duration of the existing commission.

The papers will of course be carefully returned.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

ROSCOE CONKLING,
Chairman of the Committee on Commerce, United States Senate.

To that the response was—I shall not read it all, as it is to be found in the speech to which I have referred—

To answer in an official way the questions put to me would not only compel me to violate that trust and confidence reposed in me by the President, necessary for the transaction of the business of this Department, but to disclose papers of a confidential character filed in the Department.

I think I heard from somebody a few days ago that this word "filed" had legal significance; that it was a solemn thing; that anything which was on file was consecrated to the general good, and was an official paper, and belonged to the country; that a paper addressed to the head of a Department, so it was addressed to him as "John Sherman, Secretary of the Treasury," or "to the President of the United States," is an official paper, though it may be marked private and confidential, and therefore it belongs to this body or any other legislative body. Yet we have the declaration from the then Secretary of the Treasury, a Republican of great character and of high distinction, then in a Republican administration, that he would be betraying the confidence that was reposed in him by the President of the United States if he furnished papers on file which were addressed to him, addressed to them officially, and put on file; and using the legal term, the significant term "file," which is to be made part of a statute of this country and to mean a definite thing, that it belongs to the country. Mr. Sherman in that letter refuses to send the communications on file. Has there been a communication received from the head of one of the Departments of this Government under the present administration with a refusal as broad and as distinct as that? Not one; and yet we are to pass resolutions of censure, we are to impugn the character of a high official, we are to impeach his conduct, he being a Democratic official, when there was never a word of dissent nor a resolution of censure in the case of John Sherman, Secretary of the Treasury, who had papers on file and refused to deliver them to the Senate.

Gentlemen, are we to play at politics in the Senate? Are we like children who build card houses and pull them down? Is this floor to be made the arena of mere partisan conflict, and gibes, and epithets, with a view to elevate one man and to pull down another? Why this discrimination? Why condemn the Attorney-General of the United States and Grover Cleveland, the present President of the United States, for doing what John Sherman did, against whom there was never a word of objection uttered for doing it? Oh, for a sense of rigid justice, the one weight, the one measure for all men! It is the rule of the honest trader; it should be the rule of an honest Senate.

But I pass from that resolution to the next. Now mark it:

Resolved, That it is, under these circumstances, the duty of the Senate to refuse its advice and consent to proposed removals of officers the documents and papers in reference to the supposed official or personal misconduct of whom are withheld by the Executive or any head of a Department when deemed necessary by the Senate and called for in considering the matter.

Now mark it:

Resolved, That it is, under the circumstances—

Under what circumstances? The circumstance of the removal of a Republican and the putting in of a Democrat. If I were going to make this resolution clear it ought to read:

Resolved, That, under the circumstances, to wit, the putting out of a Republican and the putting in of a Democrat, it is the duty of the Senate to refuse its advice and consent in that case to proposed removals of officers.

There has been great research among the precedents of the past, but I will venture to assert to-day that there has never passed a parliamentary body in republics or empires a measure that has an authority like that declared in this resolution. We may know instances in the Senate where in time of high partisan feeling and great excitement when passion was aroused, in single instances the Senate upon a call of this sort has refused that advice and consent; but here is a resolution that declares in advance that it refuses to advise and consent in mass. Before nominations are made, before removals are made, the Senate declares that it refuses and will refuse to advise and consent. The Constitution says that the President may appoint, and enjoins it as a duty upon the Senate to advise and consent; but the Senate says that we will refuse to advise and consent. The President sends in a nomination upon a removal or suspension from office. We do not take up the case, the Senate has already declared by proclamation and by the adoption of this resolution that the question is decided; we refuse to consider it; we will not deliberate upon it at all.

Mr. GRAY. And it is done in open session.

Mr. COLQUITT. Yes, it is declared, too, in open session, and I have no doubt it will be carried out in secret session, that we refuse to advise the President. It is the duty of the Senate to advise when the President sends an appointment, but the Senate says, "We declare in advance that in all cases where any paper that we may ask for is refused we will decline, and we so notify the President," and though it may be known to the Senate that the incumbent to be suspended or removed is an escaped convict, though they may know that he has been guilty of all sorts of fraudulent practices, though they may know that he has been cruel, unjust, and oppressive, yet the Senate declares by the adoption of the resolution that even in such a case, though we may know the man deserves to be turned out of office and to receive the indignation and the contempt of all honest men, we will not act upon the case, we will not advise about it, because we can not get a paper to which we suppose we are entitled.

And for what reason? Because the President of the United States declines to do what he believes is his duty the Senate declines to do what it knows to be its duty. I will venture to say that no such thing has ever been passed in the history of the legislative bodies of the earth as that declaration, and we are called upon to pass it. I can scarcely believe that among the well-tempered, moderate men of age and gravity and influence on the other side of this Chamber there can be found enough men to carry this resolution and put it upon the eternal records of this body.

Why shall the Senate refuse to consent and advise? We have had a good deal of undertone-talk whenever reference has been made to papers on the subject of a public character here about reform, a reform administration, as though it was to be made a subject of ridicule. Why is this resolution to be adopted? It is to prevent the President from having the power to reform the administration of this Government. The question of the civil-service tenure and civil-service reform is embodied in the Republican platform and in the Democratic platform; but though embodied in the Republican platform it has never been observed or carried out into practice. The President of the United States, true to his words and to his committals upon this subject, proposes to carry it out to the letter and to the spirit, and these gentlemen, supposing it to be some popular idea which may strengthen the administration and the Democratic party if the President should be true to his committals, are to refuse to advise and consent to his putting in men who are his own selected agents to carry out his own purposes in the way of reform. They will refuse, and then they can go before the people and stand upon the hustings and say, "Here is a President who went in with a great cry of reform. Where is the reform?" When if it has not been accomplished it has been because you have forced upon him men and agents and instrumentalities that use their power to thwart his purposes and to defeat his objects.

How long is this to continue? When are we to stop chasing principles and practices and expediencies? In 1867, when there was a President of the United States who was not in harmony with the Republican party, the Republicans limited the power of appointment. They passed such stringent laws and prohibitions that he could hardly exercise the power of removal. In placing these restrictions around Andrew Johnson in 1867 it was declared that they would establish principles that were to last for all time and for all ages. It was to be a fundamental principle in 1867; and in 1869, when General Grant became the President of the United States, it was virtually repealed, and an effort was made to suspend it entirely in order that no difficulties or limitations or restrictions should be put upon the then President of the United States in the case of removals or appointments to office. And now in 1886 the operation of the principle is to be reversed. It was made stringent and limited in 1867; it was made liberal and without restriction almost entirely in 1869; but in came a Democratic administration in 1885, and the limitations are to be reimposed.

Why, gentlemen, is this the sort of legislation that becomes great parliamentary bodies responsible to the people and to the country? Is this statesmanship? The wise statesman looks further than the present. The wise statesman forecasts the future; he regards one administration as but a day in the life of a government. He combines and compares tendencies and relations, and adapts them to the general interest of the country. But the cunning demagogue looks only to his own selfish interests and the objects of his party. He prefers trick to policy, and expediency to system.

Is it not a singular spectacle to see men and parties who loudly cry out against proscription when out of power and proscribe without mercy when in power; who reason against the power of removal when they suffer, but remove without reason when others suffer; men who argue that executive offices which used to be and are now to be considered executive offices are no longer executive under a Democratic administration, but are legislative offices when there is a Republican Senate? There ought to be something fixed; there ought to be some principle established. It is enough to make a man's head turn in undertaking to follow around the changes that have been made, as the chameleon changes its color from the air which it breathes or the object that it touches.

Now I come to the last resolution. I do not think that any one in this body would expect that it should be read or commented on. It is a bait thrown out in regard to the turning out of soldiers and putting in of others who are not soldiers. The object is so manifest that it created a smile from this body when it was read. It is intended to delude the people and to have them feel that there are really purposes and objects that are being carried out by this administration in order to discriminate against the Union soldier. It is held out but for one purpose and everybody knows it, and the people are not fooled. The people are not going to be gulled. They know why it is done.

I have passed over these resolutions for the reason that we have to vote on them and that is the last, but here comes something more that is an oddity, an appendix. What is the appendix? It shows the number of suspensions by the President the first thirty days of the present session. What has that to do with the conduct and management of the office of the southern district of Alabama? Appendix concomitant to show how many officers have been turned out to illustrate the conduct and management of the office of district attorney in the southern district of Alabama! You might just as well have attached it to the Blair bill. Why not put it on as an appendix to that? Why not put it on as an appendix to the Dakota bill, or why not put it on as an appendix to some pension bill showing the number of officers who have been suspended? Then, mark this statement, Mr. President: I will not say that the Senator from Vermont intended here to deceive the people and to make an incorrect statement, but we know that there is no honest, plain man in the country who would be deceived by reading this declaration in regard to the appendix. Appendix A shows the number of suspensions by the President "during the first thirty days of this session.

I have no doubt that the Senator from Vermont would say that these were the number of suspensions that had been sent here for confirmation and that they still remained unconfirmed during the first thirty days of the session, but that is not the statement. The statement of the chairman of the committee is that six hundred and forty suspensions have been made from offices in the first thirty days of this administration. Is it not false? I will not say that the Senator intended it as a falsehood; I do not so believe it; but it betrays to the country the lack of the most perfect sincerity and straightforwardness, for he ought to have guarded against the possibility of a construction that should be made upon it that he intended that the world should believe that six hundred and forty suspensions had been made in thirty days, and why? Because it made the charge the more startling to the country. Suppose he had said that the suspensions had been made in eight months, there would not have been much force in the appendix. Suppose he had said that since the inauguration of President Cleveland, since he went into power, in nine months there had been six hundred and forty removals, that would have startled nobody at all; but this declaration goes out to the country in the appendix that it was done in the first thirty days of the session, and the people are astonished all over the country, and will say that this is one of the most precipitous administrations ever known in the history of this Government.

Those six hundred and forty cases now remain to be tried by this body. It is a criminal docket crowded full of criminal business. Six hundred and forty men are to be arraigned; six hundred and forty charges are to be tried.

I read and have heard a great many times in my life of Mr. Benton's characterization of a resolution or bill which was presented in the House of Representatives in which he said that the bill or the resolution "carried a stump speech in its belly." This apppendix does not inject it into the body, but it ties it onto the tail of the report and the resolutions. It has nothing on the face of the earth to do with it any more than a tin box tied to the tail of a dog is a part of the dog, but it is here with a view to startle the country; it is here to make a noise; it is here to create a sensation.

Now, I may ask gentlemen if it is their duty to try these six hundred and forty cases with a view to see whether they have been guilty, whether their conduct has been good? When that is over, will they stop there? Why then should they not turn around and try the President of the United States and the heads of the Departments, and charge them with being recreant to their duty, because they had not turned out others they can prove not to be worthy of office, and we should have them tried? I submit it to these gentlemen in their sober, discreet, moderate judgment as to whether this is not trifling and paltering with their high official obligations here as Senators. The Constitution says in only one place that the commissions of judges and inferior judges shall be during good behavior, but the Senate says in the trial of this case that every officer of the Government, marshals, attorneys, internal-revenue collectors, and postmasters, shall hold their offices during good behavior; and unless cases can be made against them, as will be made against those who hold offices for good behavior, they shall be retained in office.

It is painful to witness the expiring agonies of a party in the throes of dissolution, how it clutches for power, how it glares, how it raves. I assure my friends of the opposition here that I take no delight in the triumph of the Democratic party because it brings disappointment or humiliation to them. If it were a case of personal misfortune, of personal sorrow, and of personal bereavement, no man's heart in this body, be he Republican or Democrat, would be readier in its throbs of sympathy than mine; and I wish I could soothe them. I wish I could recommend to them some reflections that would alleviate the struggle of their disappointment and their suffering as party men. I might commend to them, perhaps, Bolingbroke's Reflections upon Exile; I might commend to them a more religious work—Baxter's Saint's Rest.

Mr. FRYE. There would be great propriety in that.

Mr. COLQUITT. I might commend to them what philosophers and Christian men find always ready to stanch the wounds of grief. I would do that cheerfully and gladly, though they differ with me as party men. I can say to them that there is this consolation, which is a consolation for every patriot, which is the remark of an illustrious patriot in the past, that patriotism is sacrifice, patriotism is suffering, and every patriot surely can be resigned to the sacrifice and the suffering if it redounds to the good, the prosperity, and the happiness of his country and of his fellow-citizens.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, the pending resolutions in connection with the majority and minority reports of the Committee on the Judiciary have given rise to a very wide and extended range of debate, embracing not only grave constitutional questions as to the rights and powers of the President and Senate in respect to the appointment and removal of civil officers, but spreading over almost the whole field of partisan politics. While the view which I shall take of the question at issue between this body and the Executive does not require any discussion of the constitutionality of the tenure-of-office acts, I wish to state in passing that I am clearly of the opinion that in so far as these acts make removals from office dependent upon Senatorial consent they constitute an encroachment upon the constitutional rights and powers of the President. I believe the right of appointment, except as to inferior officers, is an executive function subject only to the check of the Senate's consent thereto; and that the power of removal, except as to constitutional tenures, is also an executive right under the Constitution, which is neither shared in by the Senate nor subject to Congressional regulation or restraint. Without, however, entering upon the discussion of this controverted subject, which has been already so ably and fully considered in the course of this debate, I shall content myself with citing in support of my opinion a few quotations from statesmen and jurists recognized to be of the highest authority.

President Jackson, in sending to the Senate April 15, 1834, his celebrated protest, said:

By the Constitution the "executive power is vested in the President of the United States." Among the duties imposed upon him, and which he is sworn to perform, is that of "taking care that the laws be faithfully executed." Being thus made responsible for the entire action of the executive department, it was but reasonable that the power of appointing, overseeing, and controlling those who execute the laws—a power in its nature executive—should remain in his hands. It is therefore not only his right, but the Constitution makes it his duty to "nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint" all "officers of the United States, whose appointments are not in the Constitution otherwise provided for," with the proviso that the appointment of inferior officers may be vested in the President alone, in the courts of justice, or in the heads of Departments.

The executive power vested in the Senate is neither that of "nominating" nor "appointing." It is merely a check upon the executive power of appointment. If individuals are proposed for appointment by the President, by them deemed incompetent or unworthy, they may withhold their consent and the appointment can not be made. They check the action of the Executive, but can not in relation to these very subjects act themselves nor direct him. Selections are still made by the President; and the negative given to the Senate, without diminishing his responsibility, furnishes an additional guarantee to the country that the subordinate executive, as well as the judicial offices, shall be filled with worthy and competent men.

The whole executive power being vested in the President, who is responsible for its exercise, it is a necessary consequence that he should have a right to employ agents of his own choice to aid him in the performance of his duties, and to discharge them when he is no longer willing to be responsible for their acts. In strict accordance with this principle, the power of removal, which, like that of appointment, is an original executive power, is left unchecked by the Constitution in relation to all executive officers, for whose conduct the President is responsible, while it is taken from him in relation to judicial officers, for whose acts he is not responsible. In the government from which many of the fundamental principles of our system are derived, the head of the executive department originally had power to appoint and remove at will all officers, executive and judicial. It was to take the judges out of this general power of removal, and thus make them independent of the Executive, that the tenure of their offices was changed to good behavior. Nor is it conceivable why they are placed in our Constitution upon a tenure different from that of all other officers appointed by the Executive, unless it be for the same purpose.

But if there were any just ground for doubt on the face of the Constitution, whether all executive officers are removable at the will of the President, it is obviated by the contemporaneous construction of the instrument and the uniform practice under it.

The power of removal was a topic of solemn debate in the Congress of 1789, while organizing the administrative departments of the Government, and it was finally decided that the President derived from the Constitution the power of removal, so far as it regards that department for whose acts he is responsible. Although the debate covered the whole ground, embracing the Treasury as well as all the other Executive Departments, it arose on a motion to strike out of the bill to establish a department of foreign affairs, since called the Department of State, a clause declaring the Secretary "to be removable from office by the President of the United States." After that motion had been decided in the negative, it was perceived that these words did not convey the sense of the House of Representatives in relation to the true source of the power of removal. With the avowed object of preventing any future inference that this power was exercised by the President in virtue of a grant from Congress, when in fact that body considered it as derived from the Constitution, the words which had been the subject of debate were struck out, and in lieu thereof a clause was inserted in a provision concerning the chief clerk of the Department, which declared that "whenever the said principal officer shall be removed from office by the President of the United States, or in any other case of vacancy," the chief clerk should during such vacancy have charge of the papers of the office. This change having been made for the express purpose of declaring the sense of Congress that the President derived the power of removal from the Constitution, the act as it passed has always been considered as a full expression of the sense of the legislature on this important part of the American Constitution.

Here, then, we have the concurrent authority of President Washington, of the Senate and House of Representatives, numbers of whom had taken an active part in the convention which framed the Constitution and in the State conventions which adopted it, that the President derived an unqualified power of removal from that instrument itself, which is "beyond the reach of legislative authority." Upon this principle the Government has now been steadily administered for about forty-five years, during which there have been numerous removals made by the President or by his direction, embracing every grade of executive officers from the heads of Departments to the messengers of bureaus.

The executive right of removal so clearly stated by General Jackson was the contemporaneous legislative construction of the Constitution; was approved by Washington, Madison, Jefferson, and other distinguished fathers of the Republic; was sanctioned by Chief-Justice Marshall and the ablest jurists and statesmen this country has produced; was practiced and acquiesced in for three-quarters of a century, and should be accepted as the proper interpretation of the Constitution, if anything can be settled.

But aside from the question of the constitutionality of legislation that attempts to restrict the executive power of removal from office or to make such removal dependent upon Senatorial consent, it is, I believe, the candid judgment of all real advocates of administrative reform that all such attempts have, so far, been unwise, and attended with no substantial benefits to the public service, and that they serve, in their present modified form even, only the purpose of partisan warfare when the Senate is not in political accord with the Executive. In this connection I ask attention to the opinion of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], as expressed in the North American Review for November, 1881:

Of all the questions which have arisen under the Constitution of the United States, except those which relate to the division of powers between the General Government and the States, the most interesting are those which bear upon the power to appoint and remove executive officers. The Constitution declares that the "executive power shall be vested in a President;" that "he shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed;" and that "before entering upon the execution of his office he shall take an oath, or affirmation, to preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States."

The President performs few executive duties except through subordinate officers. So far as the control of his subordinates is transferred from him, so far the executive power, and the power to see that the laws are faithfully executed, and the power to defend and protect the Constitution, are removed from him. So far as they are taken from the President to be given to the Senate, they are taken from an officer individually responsible and impeachable, and transferred to a numerous assembly acting on such questions in secret without individual responsibility; taken from an officer who in practice is elected by and represents the whole people, and transferred to a body elected by State Legislatures, representing States, in which Delaware and New York have an equal vote; taken from an officer whose term is but four years and transferred to a body which is perpetual, though composed of members whose tenure is for six years.

If Congress may rightfully establish a tenure of executive office beyond the control of the President's power of removal, it may pass a law just before the incoming of a new President which shall keep in office every subordinate in the country. If the Legislature may ordain that no executive officer shall be removed without the consent of the Legislature, or one branch of it, then the political character of the executive can not be changed without changing the political character of the Legislature, or of the branch of it whose consent to such removal is made necessary. In this way the executive powers conferred by the Constitution, if not destroyed altogether, may be completely subjected to another branch of the Government.

In the great debate of 1789, which Mr. EVARTS declares "decidedly the most important and the best considered debate in the history of Congress," those who claimed that the power of removals vested absolutely in the President under the Constitution, prevailed in the House of Representatives, under the lead of Madison, by a majority of 12, and by the casting vote of John Adams in the Senate. Mr. Madison said:

"The decision that is at this time made will become the permanent exposition of the Constitution; and on a permanent exposition of the Constitution will depend the genius and character of the whole Government"

Mr. Webster, in 1835, earnestly dissenting from the original decision, still admitted that he considered it "a settled point; settled by construction, settled by precedent, settled by the practice of the Government, and settled by statute." It remained so settled until, in the strife which followed the rebellion, a two-thirds majority in Congress was induced, by apprehension of a grave public danger, to attempt to wrest this portion of the executive power from the hands of Andrew Johnson. The statute of March 2, 1867, as construed by nearly two-thirds of the Senate, enacted that officers appointed by the predecessor of President Johnson, who, by the law in force when they were appointed, and by the express terms of their commission, were removable at the pleasure of the President, should remain in office until the Senate should consent to the appointment of their successors, or approve the reasons for their removal.

This statute partially served its purpose during the last two years of Johnson's administration. Five days after Grant's inauguration, the House of Representatives, by a vote of 138 to 16, passed a bill totally repealing it. The Senate was unwilling to let go the hold which it had acquired on the executive power, but proposed to suspend the law for one year, so that there might be no obstacle in the path of General Grant to the removal of the obnoxious officials who had adhered to Andrew Johnson. The present law was agreed on as a compromise. It permits the President to suspend officers during the vacation of the Senate, but restores officers so suspended at the close of the next session, unless in the mean time the advice and consent of the Senate has been obtained to a removal or the appointment of a successor.

President Grant, in his message of December, 1869, urged the repeal of this modified act on the ground that—

"It could not have been the intention of the framers of the Constitution that the Senate should have the power to retain in office persons placed there by Federal appointment, against the will of the President. The law is inconsistent with a faithful and efficient administration of the Government. What faith can an Executive put in officials forced on him, and those, too, whom he has suspended for reason? How will such officials be likely to serve an administration which they know does not trust them?"

The House acted on this recommendation and passed a bill for the repeal of the statutes of 1867 and 1869 by a vote of 159 to 25. For this bill the whole Massachusetts delegation, including both her present Senators, voted. It was never acted on by the Senate. In 1872 a similar bill passed the House without a division.

The Democratic party has invariably supported the position of Madison and Jackson, that the power of removal is vested by the Constitution in the President and can not be controlled by legislation.

* * * * * * *

If we would cure the existing evils in the civil service we must seek some other method than that of establishing by legislation a tenure of office independent of the Executive, or placing the executive power of removal under the guardianship of the Senate. If that be attempted, the reformer will furnish the spoilsman with a formidable, if not impregnable, constitutional defense. The evil of a system which treats public offices as patronage, whether to be used for the service of party or of individual ambitions, will not be cured, and experience warrants us in saying will not be diminished, by transferring the power of appointment and removal from Executive to Senate, or from Senate to Executive, or from either to the House of Representatives or to political committees.

The complaints of the leaders of the opposition about the abuse of executive power under Jackson and his successors were quite as emphatic as any we have lately heard. Patronage, however agreeable to patron or to dependent, will always be odious to those who do not share its benefits.

* * * * * * *

Another very serious evil in present methods is the sudden and often cruel removals to which faithful and worthy officials, especially women, are now exposed. I have known very numerous instances, even during the last administration, where, without the knowledge of the President or head of the Department, soldiers and soldiers' widows have, without warning and without cause, been removed from employments on which they and their households were dependent for bread, where, if a private manufacturer had dealt with his laborers in the same way, he would have deserved and received the indignation and contempt of the entire community.

The provisions of the Constitution upon the whole subject of appointments are very simple. The President may nominate, and, with the advice and consent of the Senate, may appoint. Congress may vest the appointment of inferior officers in the President alone, in the heads of Departments, or in the courts. The individual Senator has no constitutional relation to the President. His opinion, like the advice of any other citizen, depends for its weight with the Executive solely upon the President's sense of the wisdom, integrity, and means of information of the man who gives it. To make a compliance with his opinion a condition of his support of the administration in other matters, or the obtaining such support by the Executive by the use of the appointing power, is to establish a corrupt relation between the two. * * * The remedy for the evil complained of in the matter of executive appointments and removals is to have a President who is in earnest. Legislation can not remove the appointing power from the depository where the Constitution has placed it. It can not prevent the President from seeking counsel where he chooses. The chief office of the civil service reformer must be to create a public sentiment which will support the President in the reform.

But it is insisted by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] that the President has recognized and acted on the modified tenure-of-office act of April 5, 1869, carried into the Revised Statutes at sections 1767, 1768, and 1769, as subsisting and operative provisions of law. Let us admit this, and for the purpose of this debate let us further concede that so long as the President obeys these provisions in relation to removals or suspensions from office and appointments thereto the statute may be taken as valid. If, however, it is to be treated as binding upon the Executive while acting under and recognizing its existence, it must be regarded as equally binding upon the Senate and all public officials coming within its operation. Neither the Senate nor any suspended officer can complain at its enforcement. The rights of no officer who may be suspended by the President under and in pursuance of its provisions are violated or impaired, whether the act of suspension was for sufficient or insufficient reasons, good cause or no cause, in the opinion of the Senate or of the officer suspended.

It is not claimed or pretended that the President has violated any provision of the law, or in any way exceeded his authority in what he has done under it. How stands the case with the Senate? For three months or more this body has had before it six hundred and forty-three nominations for appointment in suspended cases. It has acted upon less than twenty of that number—fifteen confirmations and two rejections. What is its excuse to the country for this delay? What is its justification for this policy of obstructing the administration in the matter of appointments, on which it is made the duty of the Senate to act? The injunction of secrecy has been removed only as to the Duskin-Burnett case, and of that alone am I at liberty here to speak. The Committee on the Judiciary having selected this case on which to rest not only its vindication of the Senate's obstructive course in respect to those appointments, but also to justify the proposed resolutions condemning the conduct of the Attorney-General "as being in violation of his official duty, and subversive of the fundamental principles of the Government and of a good administration thereof," and committing the Senate to the deliberate purpose of withholding its consent to the pending or other nominations except upon certain terms to be conceded by the Executive, it becomes material and important to understand correctly the facts in relation thereto and to examine the grounds on which the Senate's course in connection therewith is sought to be defended and the Attorney-General condemned. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] has with great skill, ingenuity, and ability presented the Senate side of the controversy—a controversy which, if not inaugurated to divert attention from the Senate's obstructive policy in respect to appointments, can only serve to embarrass the administration and keep offices unsettled, to the detriment of the public service.

What are the questions involved in that controversy? They relate to the rights and privileges of this body and of the Executive in reference to papers and to the duty of this body in reference to action upon nominations. Let us examine it first upon the question of privilege. I insist that these co-ordinate independent branches of the Government should be dealt with in a spirit different from that displayed here in the course of this debate. In this connection I wish to read what Mr. Webster said in reference to their functions and relations as to each other. In the debate upon the Panama mission he said:

This seems a singular notion of confidence, and certainly is not my notion of that confidence which the Constitution requires one branch of the Government to repose in another. The President is not our agent, but, like ourselves, the agent of the people. They have trusted to his hands the proper duties of his office; and we are not to take those duties out of his hands from any opinion of our own that we should execute them better ourselves. The confidence which is due from us to the Executive and from the Executive to us is not personal, but official and constitutional. It has nothing to do with individual likings or dislikings, but results from that division of power among departments and those limitations on the authority of each which belong to the nature and frame of our Government. It would be unfortunate, indeed, if our line of constitutional action were to vibrate backward and forward according to our opinions of persons, swerving this way to-day from undue attachment and the other way to-morrow from distrust or dislike. This may sometimes happen from the weakness of our virtues or the excitement of our passions; but I trust it will not be coolly recommended to us as the rightful course of public conduct.—Webster's Works, volume 3, page 187.

In further connection with the proper relations between this body and the Executive, I desire to call attention to a report of this body itself. General Jackson, in the session of 1833–'34, had nominated four Government directors for the national bank. The Senate rejected them, and rejected them, in the opinion of General Jackson, for reasons that were not sufficient. So he returned those nominations to the Senate at a later day in the session, with a disclaimer, however, of any right on his part to inquire into the reasons for the Senate's action, but clearly intimating that they had been rejected for improper reasons. He said in the course of his special message:

I disclaim all pretension of right on the part of the President officially to inquire into, or call in question, the reasons of the Senate for rejecting any nomination whatsoever. As the President is not responsible to them for the reasons which induce him to make a nomination, so they are not responsible to him for the reasons which induce them to reject it. In these respects, each is independent of the other and both responsible to their respective constituents. Nevertheless, the attitude in which certain vital interests of the country are placed by the rejection of the gentlemen now renominated require of me frankly to communicate my views of the consequences which must necessarily follow this act of the Senate, if it be not reconsidered.

He then proceeds to review to some extent and refer to the ground on which the Senate had refused to confirm those nominations. When the nominations were returned to the Senate they were referred to a committee of which Mr. Tyler was the chairman, and he made this report:

The President disclaims, indeed, in terms, all right to inquire into the reasons of the Senate for rejecting any nomination; and yet the message immediately undertakes to infer, from facts and circumstances, what those reasons which influenced the Senate in this case must have been, and goes on to argue much at large against the validity of such supposed reasons. The committee are of opinion that if, as the President admits, he can not inquire into the reasons of the Senate for refusing its assent to nominations, it is still more clear that these reasons can not with propriety be assumed and made subjects of comment.

That is what has been done throughout the course of this debate on the Republican side of the Chamber. If you can not inquire into the reasons, says Mr. Tyler, that prompted the exercise of discretionary action, you can not infer or assume those reasons. He proceeds:

In cases in which nominations are rejected for reasons affecting the character of the persons nominated, the committee think that no inference is to be drawn except what the vote shows; that is to say, that the Senate withholds its advice and consent from the nominations. And the Senate not being bound to give reasons for its votes in these cases, it is not bound, nor would it be proper for it, as the committee think, to give any answer to remarks founded on the presumption of what such reasons must have been in the present case. They feel themselves, therefore, compelled to forego any response whatever to the message of the President, in this particular, as well by the reasons before assigned, as out of respect to that high officer.

The President acts upon his own views of public policy in making nominations to the Senate; and the Senate does no more when it confirms or rejects such nominations.

For either of these co-ordinate departments to enter into the consideration of the motives of the other would not, and could not, fail in the end to break up all harmonious intercourse between them. This your committee would deplore as highly injurious to the best interests of the country. The President, doubtless asks himself, in the case of every nomination for office, whether the person be fit for the office; whether he be actuated by correct views and and motives, and whether he be likely to be influenced by those considerations which should alone govern him in the discharge of his duties—is he honest, capable, and faithful? Being satisfied in these particulars, the President submits his name to the Senate, where the same inquiries arise, and its decision should be presumed to be dictated by the same high considerations as those which govern the President in originating the nomination.

That states precisely the proper relations between these two independent and co-ordinate branches of the Government, and yet we see that action of the Senate reversed to-day in the course that is pursued here toward the President in the present case.

As stated in the report of the majority of the committee upon the question of privilege between these two co-ordinate independent branches of the Government, there is no law or constitutional provision requiring the Executive or the Attorney-General to produce the papers in question. That is conceded in the report of the majority. What is the character of these papers?

The resolution of the Senate of January 25, 1886, called for all papers that had been filed with the Department of Justice since the 1st day of January, 1885, in relation to the management and conduct of the office of district attorney of the United States for the southern district of Alabama. To that the Attorney-General replied, as has been frequently read in the course of this debate:

In response to the said resolution the President of the United States directs me to say that the papers which were in this Department relating to the fitness of John D. Burnett, recently nominated to said office, having been already sent to the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, and the papers and documents which are mentioned in the said resolution, and still remaining in the custody of this Department, having exclusive reference to the suspension by the President of George M. Duskin, the late incumbent of the office of district attorney of the United States for the southern district of Alabama, it is not considered that the public interest will be promoted by a compliance with said resolution and the transmission of the papers and documents therein mentioned to the Senate in executive session.

Supplementing that reply of the Attorney-General by what the President stated in his special message to the Senate, we read as follows:

The letter of the Attorney-General in response to the resolution of the Senate in the particular case mentioned in the committee's report was written at my suggestion and by my direction. There had been no official papers or documents filed in his Department relating to the case within the period specified in the resolution.

A distinct statement by a co-ordinate branch of this Government that there had been no official paper filed in that Department during the period stated.

The letter was intended, by its description of the papers and documents remaining in the custody of the Department, to convey the idea that they were not official; and it was assumed that the resolution called for information, papers, and documents of the same character as were required by the requests and demands which preceded it.

Now what was the request and demand which preceded it? The request and demand which preceded it was as follows, made on the 26th of December, 1885, and was addressed to the Attorney-General:

On behalf of the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate, by its direction, I have the honor to request that you will send to me all papers and information in the possession of your Department touching the nomination of John D. Burnett; also all papers and information touching the suspension and proposed removal from office of George M. Duskin.

On the 11th of January, 1886, the Attorney-General responded by saying:

The Attorney-General states that he sends herewith all papers, &c., touching the nomination referred to, and in reference to the papers touching the suspension of Duskin from office, I have as yet received no direction from the President in relation to their transmission.

Now, I want to call the attention of the Senate briefly to some interesting authorities upon this question. It came up for consideration as to how far the executive department of the Government should respond to the calls of the House and Senate for papers early in the history of the Government. It came up as early as 1792, and from that day to this it has been uniformly held both by the executive and judicial departments of the Government that it rested in the discretion of the Executive as to what papers he would produce in response to calls by the Legislature or the courts. That was settled as early as 1792, as reported by Mr. Jefferson in his private correspondence, giving an account of the consideration and discussion of the subject by President Washington and his Cabinet, as follows:

March the 31st. A meeting at the President's; present, Thomas Jefferson, Alexander Hamilton, Henry Knox, and Edmund Randolph. The subject was the resolution of the House of Representatives of March the 27th to appoint a committee to inquire into the causes of the failure of the late expedition under Major-General St. Clair, with the power to call for such persons, papers, and records as may be necessary to assist their inquiries. The committee had written to Knox for the original letters, instructions, &c. The President had called us to consult, merely because it was the first example, and he wished that so far as it should become a precedent it should be rightly conducted. He neither acknowledged nor denied, nor even doubted the propriety of what the House were doing, for he had not thought upon it, nor was acquainted with subjects of this kind; he could readily conceive there might be papers of so secret a nature as that they ought not to be given up. We were not prepared, and wished time to think and inquire.

April the 2d (1792). Met again at the President's, on the same subject. We had all considered, and were of one mind, first, that the House was an inquest, and therefore might institute inquiries. Secondly, that it might call for papers generally. Thirdly, that the Executive ought to communicate such papers as the public good would permit, and ought to refuse those the disclosure of which would injure the public; consequently were to exercise a discretion. Fourthly, that neither the committee nor House had a right to call on the head of a Department, who and whose papers were under the President alone, but that the committee should instruct their chairman to move the House to address the President.

I say from that day to this, from the settlement then solemnly had by President Washington and his Cabinet down to this hour, there has never been any authority, either judicial or legislative, to question the right of the President to determine for himself what papers should be disclosed in the interest of the public service. It rests in his discretion; he is to determine, and he alone, whether it will be promotive or productive of the public interest to produce papers. He has said to us and to the country that there are no official papers in connection with the subject of your inquiry; that they all relate exclusively to the suspension of Duskin and that it will not be productive of the public interest to produce those papers; and in the face of that statement he and his Attorney-General are to be censured and their official conduct is to be declared subversive of the fundamental principles of the Government. It was in Washington's day and in Washington's Cabinet decided that the discretion rested with him, and that he should not disclose papers when in his judgment the public interest would be injuriously affected. Every member of the Cabinet was present, including Hamilton, and all concurred in these proceedings. Washington followed that up in 1796 in his reply to the House when he denied their right to papers unless they wanted them for impeachment purposes, saying in response to the resolution of the House:

I repeat that I have no disposition to withhold any information which the duty of my station will permit, or the public good shall require, to be disclosed; and, in fact, all the papers affecting the negotiation with Great Britain were laid before the Senate when the treaty itself was communicated for their consideration and advice.

As, therefore, it is perfectly clear to my understanding that the assent of the House of Representatives is not necessary to the validity of a treaty; as the treaty with Great Britain exhibits in itself all the objects requiring legislative provision, and on these the papers called for can throw no light; and as it is essential to the due administration of the Government that the boundaries fixed by the Constitution between the different Departments should be preserved—a just regard to the Constitution and to the duty of my office, under all the circumstances of this case, forbid a compliance with your request.

This right of the Executive to determine in his discretion what papers he will make public has been followed up and asserted by nearly every President since that day to the present and has been recognized and respected by all Departments of the Government. In the case cited in the majority report as occurring in 1842, the attention of the Senate is called to the fact that Mr. Tyler declared that in dealing with executive matters the Senate should communicate directly with the Executive. There occurred during Tyler's administration another case of this sort. I will read the resolution of the House of Representatives calling for papers from the Secretary of War:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be required to communicate to this House the several reports lately made to the Department by Lieutenant-Colonel Hitchcock, relative to the affairs of the Cherokee Indians, together with all information communicated by him concerning the frauds which he was charged to investigate; also all the facts in the possession of the Department, from any source, relating to the subject.

To which the Secretary of War replied:

The want of time, until recently, to examine some of the reports referred to, has prevented an earlier answer to the resolution.

The reports relating to the Cherokees contain information and suggestions in reference to the matters which it was supposed would become the subject of a negotiation between this Department and the delegates of the Cherokee Nation who have been appointed to settle their claims and all other matters of difference with the Government of the United States, and who have now arrived in this city. The nature and subject of the report, and the opinion of the President and of this Department, render its publication, at this time, inconsistent with the public interest.

The other report referred to in the resolution, relating to alleged frauds of Indian agents, contains such information as Lieutenant-Colonel Hitchcock was enabled to obtain by ex parte inquiries of various persons, whose statements were necessarily without the sanction of an oath, and which the persons implicated have had no opportunity to contradict or explain. To promulgate these statements at this time would be grossly unjust to these persons, and would be calculated to defeat rather than promote the objects of the inquiry. Sufficient opportunity has not been given to the Department to pursue the investigation, or to call upon the parties affected for explanations, or to determine on the measures proper to be adopted.

And so that was refused. What does Attorney-General Devens say on this subject? In 1877, considering and replying to an inquiry that covered the very class of papers now in question, he said:

With reference to the recommendation in question, however, I do not understand that they come within the description of either records, papers, or documents belonging to the Departments and required to be kept by them. They are papers which are filed from time to time by parties for their own convenience, sometimes in favor of, and sometimes in opposition to, particular persons who are named as candidates for executive offices; and they are permitted (according to the rule which is understood to be adopted in all the Executive Departments) to be withdrawn from the files whenever the applicants for office desire it. While undoubtedly the Department may retain, if it sees fit, any or all of these papers, its custody of them is more generally for the convenience of those parties who file them than for its own.

I call attention to another authority during the time of Mr. Tyler. Here is his special message of March 23, 1842, when he was called upon by the House of Representatives to know whether a certain class of persons were applicants for office. He said in reply to that resolution:

If it were consistent with the rights and the duties of the executive department it would afford me great pleasure to furnish in this, as in all cases in which proper information is demanded, a ready compliance with the wishes of the House of Representatives. But since, in my view, general considerations of policy and propriety, as well as a proper defense of the rights and safeguards of the executive department, require of me as the Chief Magistrate to refuse compliance with the terms of this resolution, it is incumbent on me to urge, for the consideration of the House of Representatives, my reasons for declining to give the desired information.

All appointments to office made by a President become, from the date of their nomination to the Senate, official acts, which are matter of record, and are at the proper time made known to the House of Representatives and to the country. But applications for office, or letters respecting appointments, or conversations held with individuals on such subjects, are not official proceedings, and can not by any means be made to partake of the character of official proceedings, unless, after the nomination of such person so writing or conversing, the President shall think proper to lay such correspondence or such conversations before the Senate. Applications for office are in their very nature confidential; and, if the reasons assigned for such applications, or the names of the applicants, were communicated, not only would such implied confidence be wantonly violated, but, in addition, it is quite obvious that a mass of vague, incoherent, and personal matter would be made public at a vast consumption of time, money, and trouble, without accomplishing, or tending in any manner to accomplish, as it appears to me, any useful object connected with a sound and constitutional administration of the Government in any of its branches.

But there is a consideration of a still more effective and lofty character, which is with me entirely decisive of the correctness of the view that I have taken of this question. While I shall ever evince the greatest readiness to communicate to the House of Representatives all proper information which the House shall deem necessary to a due discharge of its constitutional obligations and functions, yet it becomes me, in defense of the Constitution and laws of the United States, to protect the executive department from all encroachment on its powers, rights, and duties. In my judgment, a compliance with the resolution which has been transmitted to me would be a surrender of duties and powers which the Constitution has conferred exclusively on the Executive; and therefore such compliance can not be made by me nor by the heads of Departments by my direction. The appointing power, so far as it is bestowed on the President by the Constitution, is conferred without reserve or qualification. The reason for the appointment and the responsibility of the appointment rest with him alone.

Mr. Webster was a member of Mr. Tyler's Cabinet when that special message was written and communicated to the House. But the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], as I understand, in his statement of the case on the 9th of February last on the floor of the Senate made this qualification. He said:

If among the papers on the files there are papers never intended for the public and he chooses to withhold them on the ground that they were received by him in confidence, then, as a matter of course, that would probably be the exercise of a discretion which gentlemen in their intercourse with each other would recognize by saying, "That is a matter I do not care to talk about; that came to you in confidence; I can not say anything about it."

But the trouble in this case is that the Senate will not take the President's statement; that the Senators on the other side of the Chamber refuse to assent to the President's positive and official declaration that there are no official papers filed in the Department of Justice between the dates indicated. They refuse to accede to the proposition that all papers and documents in the custody of the Department of Justice relate alone to the suspension of Duskin and are private and confidential, and refuse to recognize in the President the right to say whether the public service will be affected or injured by their production and disclosure or not.

Sir, has this body, has the Congress of the United States any more authority over papers in the Executive Departments of this Government than the co-ordinate independent branch of the Government—the judiciary? The judicial department of this Government has as much power and authority over all papers in the hands of the Executive or in any Department as the entire Congress has. When the rights of individuals, affecting their life, liberty, or property, are pending before the courts, the judicial department has as much power over papers as the Senate or the whole Congress; and yet it has been universally recognized from the very foundation of this Government that the judicial department of the Government can not call for papers and procure them either from the President or the head of an Executive Department at its own will, but that the discretion rests with the Executive and with the Departments how far and to what extent they will produce those papes. That question came distinctly before Chief-Justice Marshall on the trial of Aaron Burr. General Wilkinson had written on the 12th of November, 1806, a letter to President Jefferson giving him information as to Burr's proceedings. President Jefferson placed that letter in the hands of the Attorney-General and the Attorney-General placed it in the hands of the district attorney. It was laid before the grand jury and Burr was indicted, put upon trial for his life for treason, and Jefferson was summoned and ordered under a subpœna duces tecum to bring that letter. Burr swore that it might be material to his defense; he pressed the matter with all the vigor possible upon Chief-Justice Marshall, pressed upon him that the defense were entitled to that letter. Mr. Jeffeason replied to the subpœna as follows:

On re-examination of a letter of November 12, 1806, from General Wilkinson to myself (which having been for a considerable time out of my possession, is now returned to me), I find in it some passages entirely confidential, given for my information, in the discharge of my executive functions, and which my duties and the public interest forbid me to make public. I have, therefore, given above a correct copy of all those parts which I ought to permit to be made public. Those not communicated are in no wise material for the purposes of justice, on the charges of treason or misdemeanor, depending against Aaron Burr; they are on subjects irrelevant to any issues which can arise out of those charges, and could contribute nothing toward his acquittal or conviction. The papers mentioned in the first and third paragraphs, as inclosed in the letter, being separated therefrom, and not in my possession, I am unable, from memory, to say what they were. I presume they are in the hands of the attorney for the United States.

Given under my hand this 7th day of September, 1807.

Mr. Burr and his able counsel pressed upon Chief-Justice Marshall that he should have that entire letter. Chief-Justice Marshall said that as to papers communicated to the executive department of the Government, the President must determine, in his discretion, how far he will produce them even when life is involved. What is involved here? Not a thing; not the question even of a man's retention in office. The case before the Senate has been incorrectly presented. The case does not fall within the tenure-of-office act. All the pretexts for wanting information, as I shall show before I get through, all the reasons assigned for wanting information are the flimsiest and purest pretexts ever concocted in order to wage political warfare against the President.

The decision, to which I have just alluded, has been recognized as law in this country ever since. Will it be said to the people of this country that this body has more authority over papers than the Judicial Department of the Government? I think not.

I read from a case before the supreme court of Pennsylvania, a case arising on a charge made against a public officer to the governor. He was charged in an affidavit with such frequent intoxication that he was unfit to perform the duties of his office with dignity and propriety. The supreme court of Pennsylvania, after a thorough consideration of that case, upon the governor's refusal to produce the paper, said it could not compel him; that there were grave reasons of public policy why it should not be made public; that men would be deterred from giving information as to what affected the public; that if all their letters and communications to the executive, all their information about misconduct in officials were produced, the peace of society would be disturbed and men would be deterred from giving that information to the executive which ought to be given in respect to all public officials. The court, upon the ground of a broad public policy, decided that the document should not be produced by the governor, if in his opinion the public interest would not be promoted thereby; that it rested in his discretion. This Senate is assuming for itself higher rights and functions than belong to a co-ordinate branch of this Government in insisting upon papers as an excuse for their neglect or refusal to perform their duties—in demanding papers that a co-ordinate branch of this Government, the Judicial Department, could not obtain. I will not dwell upon this branch of the subject. The principle involved is familiar to every lawyer of this body. It is a principle affecting public policy and not the rights of a private individual. It is admirably stated in Greenleaf on Evidence, section 250, as follows:

The President of the United States, and the governors of the several States, are not bound to produce papers or disclose information communicated to them, when, in their own judgment, the disclosure would on public considerations be inexpedient. And where the law is restrained by public policy from enforcing the production of papers, the like necessity restrains it from doing what would be the same thing in effect, namely, receiving secondary evidence of their contents.

* * * * * * *

SEC. 476. But, in all cases of public writings, if the disclosure of their contents would, either in the judgment of the court or of the Chief Executive Magistrate, or the head of Department, in whose custody or under whose control they may be kept, be injurious to the public interests, an inspection will not be granted.

Also in Wharton's Law of Evidence I find the following, at page 549:

In conformity with this view it has been held that communications in official correspondence relating to matters of state can not be produced as evidence in an action against a person holding an office, for an injury charged to have been done by him in exercise of the power given to him as such officer; not only because such communications are confidential, but because their disclosures might betray secrets of state policy. And where a minister of state subpœnaed, to produce public documents, objects to do so on the ground that their publication would be injurious to the public interest, the court ought not to compel their publication; and the question, whether the production of such a document would be injurious to the public service, must be determined by the head of the Department having the custody of the paper, and not by the judge.

But passing from that feature of the subject, I wish to examine the reasons that have been assigned for wanting these papers. What are they? The Senator from Vermont has stated them, and his proposition, as I understand it, is that as the Senate is called upon to consent to the removal of Duskin, it is entitled to have from the executive department all papers and documents placed in the Department of Justice between the 1st day of January, 1885, and the 2d day of January, 1886, in relation to the office of United States district attorney for the southern district of Alabama. That is the proposition, but I want to get it before the Senate in a way that there will be no question about it and the manner in which he laid it before the Senate.

He commenced by citing various statutes in reference to the duties of the Attorney-General. The first section of the statute cited by him was 362, requiring the Attorney-General to supervise the offices and require reports from district attorneys in such time and manner as the Attorney-General may direct. He then read section 833 requiring every district attorney, clerk of a district court, clerk of a circuit court, and marshal to file on the 1st day of January, each year, or within thirty days thereafter, with the Attorney-General a report. Those are the material statutes so far as he read. Then he came to the commission of Duskin, and stated:

His [Mr. Duskin's] commission, if I am correctly informed, read this way:

"CHESTER A. ARTHUR, President of the United States of America, to all to whom these presents shall come, greeting:

"Know ye that, reposing special trust and confidence in the integrity, diligence, and discretion of George M. Duskin, I have nominated and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, do appoint him to be attorney of the United States for the southern district of Alabama, and do authorize and empower him to execute and fulfill the duties of that office according to law, and to have and to hold the said office, with all the rights, privileges, and emoluments thereunto legally appertaining unto him the said George M. Duskin, until a successor shall have been appointed and duly qualified."

It is true that the distinguished Senator says he believes or is informed, judging from the revised reports of the Department of Justice, that this is the form of the commission, and then proceeds:

If I am correct as to the form of the commission, it will appear that under the broad seal of the United States and the signature of its then President, this gentleman, Mr. Duskin, was authorized and empowered to perform the duties of that office until his successor should have been duly appointed and qualified.

This is an important statement, laying the foundation for his argument. He then gives the fact of the suspension on the 17th of July, 1885; then the appointment of John D. Burnett. He then proceeds to give the resolution calling for the papers relating to the management and conduct of the office—the resolution of the 25th of January, 1886, calling for the papers and documents filed between the 1st of January, 1885, and date of that order. He then gives the reply of the Attorney-General, and proceeds:

The question then is, Mr. President, what was the nature of this nomination that the President of the United States sent to the Senate? You will observe that he had not undertaken, in the face of a statute that forbade it, to remove Mr. Duskin from the office of attorney of the United States for the southern district of Alabama, but pursuant to the statute and acting in terms under its authority and under no other authority, he suspended this gentleman from the performance of his duties. This gentleman remained still the attorney of the United States for the southern district of Alabama. He stood in the attitude of a military officer under arrest, as the President of the United States to-day might place the Lieutenant-General of the armies of the United States, General Sheridan; but that would not take General Sheridan out of the Army, I take it.

This act of the President, therefore, did not profess to be and was not an attempt to remove Mr. Duskin, but to withhold from him the right to perform the functions of that office until the judgment of the Senate could be taken in respect of his removal and the appointment of his successor. He takes pains, as he should, in his order of suspension and in his order of designation to state that both are subject to all the laws applicable thereto; and the preceding section of the Revised Statutes, a part of the law of 1867 and of 1869, declared in explicit terms that this man should not be removed except by the advice and consent of the Senate. It is plain, therefore, that he did not undertake to remove him, and that when the nomination of Burnett was sent to the Senate Duskin was the attorney of the United States for the southern district of Alabama. The proposition of the nomination was that Duskin should be removed by the appointment of this selected gentleman, if it should meet with the approval of the Senate, as his successor.

That was the proposition: and therefore if the Senate of the United States were even a jury and had to submit to the judgment of the President of the United States as a judge as to what evidence should be laid before it connected with the case, and its relevancy, it would have been relevant on the very issue submitted by the judge to the jury to know what was the conduct and management of that office in the hands of the person whom the President asked the Senate to assist him in displacing permanently by the appointment of a successor. That was the question.

He then gives the opinions of Attorneys-General Akerman and Devens as to the effect of the law in regard to suspensions, and continues:

Thus, sir, it will be seen, in spite of sundry misleading discussions in the public press, and in spite of sundry inaccurate things stated in a message of the President of the United States to this body, and in spite of sundry inaccurate statements in the views of the minority of the Committee on the Judiciary as to what is the case we have now to consider, that by the law as it had been placed on the statute-book, by the action of all the administrations that had existed after the law was passed, and by the action of the present President of the United States himself in obedience to it, he has invited the Senate of the United States to agree with him in removing Mr. Duskin from office by the appointment and commissioning of a successor.

That being so—and it is incapable of dispute—the question is whether, on the theory of the Attorney-General or the President of the United States or the minority of this committee, official papers in the Department of Justice bearing upon the administration of the officer that we are asked to remove are relevant to the subject. I take it there is but one answer to that.

The Senator says:

These papers, therefore, on the statement of the Attorney-General—

Are relevant to this question. That statement is repeated by the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Wisconsin. Mr. President, let me now go back and see how far there are inaccuracies in that statement. The Senator from Vermont has fallen into a mistake, inadvertently, no doubt, in giving Duskin's commission as a commission running "until a successor shall have been appointed and duly qualified." That is a necessary foundation of his position, that these papers are needed in order to see whether you will agree to a successor or not. The form of commission read by the Senator from Vermont was the form adopted under the act of 1867 and continued in force until the 5th of April, 1869. It did not continue thereafter.

The first section of the act of 1867 applied to all officers who were appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, without reference to the question of any statutory tenure of office; but by the act of 1869, which repealed that section of the act of 1867, the officer was entitled to hold only during the term for which he was appointed. Where there was a fixed term by law he was entitled only to hold during the term for which he was appointed. What was Duskin's term? By the statute itself it is provided:

SEC. 679. District attorneys shall be appointed for a term of four years, and their commission shall cease and expire at the expiration of four years from their respective dates.

So Duskin's commission, in point of fact and of law, read as follows:

CHESTER A. ARTHUR, President of the United States of America, to all to whom these presents shall come, greeting:

Know ye that, reposing special trust and confidence in the integrity, ability, and diligence of George M. Duskin, I have nominated and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, do appoint him to be attorney of the United States for the southern district of Alabama, and do authorize and empower him to execute and fulfill the duties of that office according to law, and to have and to hold the said office, with all the powers, privileges, and emoluments to the same of right appertaining, unto him, the said George M. Duskin, for the term of four years from the day of the date hereof.

In witness whereof I have caused these letters to be made patent and the seal of the United States to be hereunto affixed.

Given under my hand, at the city of Washington, the 20th day of December, in the year of our Lord 1881, and of the Independence of the United States the one hundred and fifth.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR. President.

It was necessary in order to maintain this case before the Senate and the country to give Duskin a commission lasting until his successor was appointed and qualified.

Mr. GEORGE. Where did he get that form?

Mr. JACKSON. The Senator from Vermont said he obtained it from the register of the Department of Justice, I believe, or that it was the form in use, and he had the revised edition of that register up to 1884, and still found the commission in that form there; but no such commission is in force; no such commission as that exists in this Duskin case, nor has existed since the 5th of April, 1869. If it did exist it would be utterly void in the face of the statute, and not only in the face of the statute I read, but in the very face and letter of the tenure-of-office act of 1869, for by section 1770 it is provided, following the tenure-of-office clauses—

Nothing in sections 1767, 1768, or 1769 shall be construed to extend the term of any office the duration of which is limited by law.

We have a law fixing his term; we have the fourth section of the tenure-of-office act saying that nothing in those preceding sections that of the act of April 5, 1869, "shall be construed to extend the term of any office the term of which is limited by law." Duskin was appointed on the 20th of December, 1881. His term of office expired on the 20th of December, 1885. The office then became vacant, as is stated in our minority report, and the attention of the Senate has been called to the fact that it has been vacant from that day to this.

What did the President do? He suspended Duskin on the 17th of July, 1885. The temporary appointee, Mr. Burnett, has been called upon by no law to make any report from that day up to the date at which this demand for papers was called for, and no papers are needed so far as he is concerned.

The President suspended George M. Duskin on the 17th of July, 1885; and on the 14th of December, 1885, he submitted Burnett's name to the Senate for the permanent appointment. Now, bear in mind that this body never acts upon the temporary appointment or the temporary suspension. It is not required either by the law or the Constitution to be reported to this body. But what was reported? The President reported to the Senate on the 14th of December, 1885, that he had suspended Duskin and nominated Burnett for the permanent term. There is no connection between the temporary and permanent term. The Supreme Court of the United States has settled it authoritatively that the two terms do not run together and are not a continuation the one of the other; that the temporary appointment is not acted upon by the Senate.

On the 14th of December he nominated Burnett for the term of four years from the date of his commission. When Burnett's name was sent to the Senate Duskin had just six days of unexpired term. For six days the Senate had before it the question of Duskin's removal, only for six days was the question of removal involved. It is the practice of the Senate to act always in advance of the expiration of a term, but what was the condition of things on the 20th of December, 1885, before any controversy originated between the Senate and the President? They had failed to act during Duskin's term of office, and on the 20th of December, 1885, the office became vacant.

The proposition is now, on the part of the Republican Senate, not to fill that vacancy unless the President of the United States will disclose the private correspondence in respect to the suspension of Duskin; we are deliberately told that there shall be a vacancy in this office, that the Senate will not fill it unless these papers are produced. I submit—and it is known to every Senator in this body—that if the President had withdrawn the nomination of Burnett, on the 20th of December, 1885, and had returned the same nomination to this body, saying: "I appoint Burnett in the place of Duskin whose term has expired," there is not a Senator on this floor but knows that he would have been confirmed before this. We know that this would have been so, as the Senate have been confirming appointments in such cases. But because he would not withdraw the name and make a new nomination, or disclose the grounds on which he suspended Duskin, or the papers which would show the fact, you are determined not to act on this vacant office.

Every day the President has allowed the name of Burnett to remain before the Senate, it is a continuing nomination for the position of United States district attorney for the southern district of Alabama. There was a vacancy when this controversy commenced. That vacancy was known to the Judiciary Committee, known by the records of this Senate and the public documents on its own files. What has been the status of things since the expiration of Duskin's term? On the 21st of December, 1885, and for each succeeding day thereafter to the present, the nomination of Burnett, being unrecalled by the Executive, the Senate has had before it no question as to the removal of Duskin. The continuing nomination of Burnett since the 20th of December, 1885, is in legal effect and operation a message from the President to the Senate, making or embodying, as read, in the light of the actual facts and law of the case, the following recitals:

To the Senate of the United States:

The President, in the exercise of the absolute and unqualified discretion vested in him by law, on the 17th day of July, 1885, suspended George M. Duskin, United States district attorney for the southern district of Alabama—such suspension to extend to the close of the first session of the Forty-ninth Congress or until the expiration of his statutory term of office. He was appointed and commissioned on the 20th of December, 1881, for the term of four years from that date, and by the express provisions of the law (section 769, Revised Statutes) his term and commission expired on the 20th of December, 1885. The provisions of the tenure-of-office law no longer apply to his case, it being expressly declared by section 1770, Revised Statutes, that "nothing in sections 1767, 1768, and 1769 shall be construed to extend the term of any office the duration of which is limited by law." The office of United States district attorney for the southern district of Alabama is therefore now vacant as to the permanent term, and to fill that vacancy I nominate John D. Burnett, a lawyer of high standing and ability, well qualified for the discharge of the duties of the office, and against whom no charges or objections are presented.

This is in substance the communication of the Executive, which the Senate has had before it since the 21st of December, 1885. What is the Senate's reply? It is in substance this: "The Senate is aware by its own records and other public documents that Duskin's term commenced on the 20th of December, 1881. By operation of law his term expired on the 20th of December, 1885; that no action of the Senate can either restore Duskin to office or extend his term beyond that date; that his case does not, since the 20th of December, 1885, come within the provisions of the tenure-of-office law; that the Senate has nothing whatever to do with the question of his suspension and the temporary appointment of another to discharge the duties of the office till the end of the present session of Congress, or the close of Duskin's term; that the office is now vacant as to the permanent term proposed to be filled by the appointment of John D. Burnett, against whom there is no charge or objection.

This is all true, but the Committee on the Judiciary having on the 26th of December, 1885, after the expiration of Duskin's term, requested of the Attorney-General "the papers, &c., touching the suspension from office of said Duskin," and on the 25th of Jannary, 1886, having repeated that demand in the shape of a call, under a resolution of the Senate, "for copies of all documents and papers that have been filed in the Department of Justice since the 1st day of January, 1885, in relation to the management and conduct of the office of district attorney of the United States of the southern district of Alabama," which papers and documents relating to the suspension of Duskin and his management and conduct of the office, the Senate desired in order to determine whether it would consent to his removal of said Duskin, and the President having assumed the right to withhold the private, unofficial, and confidential papers relating exclusively to the suspension of said Duskin, the only ones in the custody of the Department, the Senate, instead of performing its constitutional duty of acting upon the pending nomination, filling the vacancy caused by the expiration of Duskin's term of office during the session, has determined to allow that vacancy to continue, and to censure the conduct of the Attorney-General as "in violation of his official duty and subversive of the fundamental principles of the Government and of a good administration thereof," and to declare by solemn resolution that it is the duty of the Senate under such circumstances "to refuse its advice and consent to proposed removals from office where all the papers and documents relating to the supposed official and personal misconduct of such officers are withheld by the Executive or any Department when called for by the Senate."

This is the exact attitude of the pending controversy between the Senate and the President on this Duskin-Bennett case, the only one open for public discussion. It may be said that it is narrowing the controversy too much to confine and consider it upon the facts of this particular case. But this is the case presented by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, and on which it is proposed to condemn the conduct of the Attorney-General for not producing the papers, wholly irrelevant to the matter before the Senate, "as in violation of his official duty and subversive of the fundamental principles of the Government and of a good administration thereof." This is a grave charge. If true, it involves an impeachable offense; and if it can not be sustained upon the case before the Senate, but rests upon some other case or act, it should have been pointed out.

Mr. President, if this unnecessary controversy is not to be considered and determined on the case presented we had better have a stay of proceedings until the Senator from Vermont can amend his warrant. In the present attitude of the case the alleged reasons paraded with so much pomp for wanting papers to determine whether you will consent to a removal already effected by operation of law must be taken as mere pretexts for an attack which the distinguished Senator and his associates desired to make upon the President's professions and efforts at administrative reform. In arranging for this political target practice, in which the Senate has now been engaged for ten days, the able and ingenious chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary has omitted to place the target within the circle of the tenure-of-office act. This has not, however, discouraged either him or his associates, but has allowed each to select his own mark, choose his own firearms, and shoot at random.

Mr. President, this whole proceeding is purely political in its character. There can be no settlement of it here by the action, restoration, or determination of either party to the controversy. Both must appeal to the people, whose common agents both we and the President are.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask my colleague if it will be more convenient to him to proceed in the morning. I see he is somewhat hoarse.

Mr. JACKSON. I yield the floor.

Mr. HARRIS. With the consent of my colleague I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest that it would be well to change the motion to one for an executive session.

Mr. HARRIS. I have no objection to that, and will make that motion.

Mr. HOAR. I do not mean to say that I will favor that, but I prefer it to an adjournment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GORMAN in the chair). The Senator from Tennessee moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After forty-two minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, March 22, 1886.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D., as follows:

We beseech Thee, Almighty God, help the people of this country to learn that money gained otherwise than as Thou commandest—by the sweat of the face, as the fair and honest wage of honorable, manly work of brain or hand—is gained by theft, no matter how we name the stealing; that money is never converted into wealth unless it ceases to be the pander of our lusts and lifts us above the level of the animal, lifting us to the graces of life, elevating our hearts to manly aspirations, making us kindly with our kind, patient to God's laws, and reverent to ourselves.

Rid the land, we beseech Thee, of all gamesters, whether they gamble with dice or cards or chips, or with wheat or stocks or corn or cotton. Deliver us from the influence and power of robbers who, enticing their victims to boards of trade and stock exchanges and bucket-shops, name their practices of plunder "shearing the lambs."

Enlighten our intelligence with Thy truth; sweeten and deepen our humanity with Thy love; quicken our piety with Thy spirit; and may Jesus Christ become more and more the master and ruler of our lives and characters and thoughts. We pray through His hallowed name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday was read and approved.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the prayer of the Chaplain this morning be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I most cordially unite in that request.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will direct the Official Reporter to insert the prayer in the RECORD.

The prayer is printed above.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same, namely:

To Mr. ERMENTROUT, for ten days from March 19.

To Mr. TUCKER, for three days, on account of important business.

To Mr. ATKINSON, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia, until Monday next.

ENGROSSED COPY OF A SENATE BILL.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the order which the Chair will now direct the Clerk to read will be made.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That the Clerk be directed to request the Senate to furnish the House with an engrossed copy of Senate bill No. 831, for the relief of George S. Storrs, of the State of Texas, the original having been mislaid in the House.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the unfinished business coming over from last Friday, being the bills on which the previous question was ordered by the House on that day.

EMILY LOUISA SPICER.

The first business coming over from the 19th instant on which the previous question was ordered was the bill (H. R. 5506) granting a pension to Emily Louisa Spicer, the question being on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

MARY E. FILLEBROWN.

The next bill on the Calendar coming over as unfinished business from last Friday's session was the bill (H. R. 1138) to increase the pension of Mary E. Fillebrown, on which the previous question was ordered.

The bill was passed.

MALITTY ROSE.

The next business coming over from last Friday was the bill (H. R. 2585) for the relief of the estate of Malitty Rose, on which the previous question was ordered.

The bill was again read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the United States pension agent at Knoxville, Tenn., be, and he hereby is, authorized to pay to the administrator of the estate of Malitty Rose, deceased, the sum of $1,556.68, out of any money he may have placed to his credit for the payment of pensions; the said sum being due on account of reissue certificate numbered 3259, issued to said Malitty Rose prior to her death, as widow of Elias Rose, a private in Captain McCoy's company, United States infantry.

Mr. MATSON. I think, Mr. Speaker, there is a motion pending to commit this bill to the Committee on Claims. If not, I desire to enter that motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised that the motion is not pending, so far as the Journal shows.

Mr. MATSON. Then I move that the bill be committed to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. RANDALL. Is the previous question prevailing on this bill?

The SPEAKER. It is; but the motion to commit is in order.

Mr. RANDALL. I understand that.

Mr. MATSON. My motion is that it be committed to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I reported this bill from the Committee on Pensions according to its instructions, and I think it was properly committed in the first instance——

The SPEAKER. The motion to commit is not debatable, the previous question having been ordered on the passage of the bill; pending which the motion is made to commit.

Mr. BRADY. Is not the question of reference under consideration?

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I desire to make a remark on the question of order involved here. Or I will make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Is a motion of this kind in order, to recommit this bill to another committee after it was reported by the committee which had it in charge, the bill having been referred to that committee by the Speaker? The bill, as a matter of course, can be referred to any committee even if it did not properly come under the jurisdiction of that committee. But this being clearly a pension matter, the bill was certainly referred to the proper committee in the first instance and was properly reported by that committee back to the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the practice of the House has been not to permit debate on the motion to commit or recommit after the previous question has been ordered on the passage of the bill although the motion itself can be entertained.

The question being taken on Mr. MATSON'S motion to commit the bill to the Committee on Claims, there were—ayes 53, noes 33.

Mr. BEACH. I make the point that a quorum has not voted.

Mr. BLAND. I do not think the House understands the question, and I should like to have the bill reported again.

The SPEAKER. That can be done by unanimous consent. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri? The Chair hears none.

The bill was again read.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania.. I ask for the reading of the report.

The SPEAKER. That is in the nature of debate, but the report can be read by unanimous consent.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent that the report be read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. OATES. I object.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON]. The point of no quorum having been made, the Chair appoints as tellers the gentleman from New York [Mr. BEACH] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON].

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 64, noes 52.

Mr. BEACH. This is a very important matter, and we ought to have a quorum.

Mr. MATSON. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered—41 members voting therefor.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Would it be in order to ask unanimous consent that either the introducer of the bill or the gentleman who reported it make a short statement to the House not exceeding five minutes?

Mr. MORRISON. I call for the regular order.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BUCHANAN. My inquiry is whether it would be in order to state that the business before the Committee on Claims is in such a shape that a vote to send it to that committee would kill the bill?

The SPEAKER. That is debate. The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 123, nays 78, not voting 122; as follows:

RESOLUTIONS IN RELATION TO THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE RANKIN.

Mr. BRAGG. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that at the close of the session on Thursday afternoon of this week a recess be taken until half past 7 o'clock, at which time I will move the consideration of the resolutions relating to the death of my late colleague, Mr. RANKIN.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. BEACH. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. BEACH. I desire to submit some remarks.

The SPEAKER. This is not debatable; it is a request for unanimous consent.

Mr. BEACH. It is in the nature of a motion, is it not?

The SPEAKER. It is not a motion; it is a request for unanimous consent.

Mr. BEACH. I shall not object to it; but I should like the privilege of making a few remarks upon the motion.

The SPEAKER. There being no objection, the order is made as requested by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG].

The gentleman from New York [Mr. BEACH], as the Chair understands, asks unanimous consent to——

Mr. BEACH. To detain the House only three or four minutes in connection with the motion which has just been agreed to.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order.

ORDER OE BUSINESS.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have the bill (H. R. 148), with a substitute, reported on the 24th of February, recommitted to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will entertain the request after the unfinished business is disposed of.

MARGARET B. HARWOOD.

The next unfinished business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. 81) granting a pension to Margaret B. Harwood.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Margaret B. Harwood, widow of Rear-Admiral Andrew A. Harwood, late of the United States Navy, and pay her a pension of $50 a month from and after the passage of this act.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall this bill pass?

Mr. REAGAN. How does this bill get before the House, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The previous question was ordered upon it on Friday last, and it comes over, under the practice of the House, as unfinished business.

Mr. REAGAN. Is it debatable?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised (not having been present when the bill was considered) that there was no debate upon it when the previous question was ordered. That being the case, under the rules of the House there are thirty minutes for debate; fifteen minutes in support of the bill and fifteen minutes in opposition to it.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a second.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, there is a Senate bill upon the Speaker's table which is a fac-simile of this bill, and I desire to ask unanimous consent to substitute that for the House bill. After that consent is given if there is any desire for information with reference to this subject I will briefly lay the facts before the House.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Let us hear the facts first, and then we will be in better condition to vote intelligently.

The SPEAKER. The request of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] requires unanimous consent.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The gentleman has a certain time for the discussion of the bill. He now asks unanimous consent that the Senate bill be substituted for the House bill, and I suggest that he make his statement first for the information of the House.

Mr. ROGERS. If it is in order, I will proceed to do that.

The SPEAKER. That is in order. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] has fifteen minutes for the discussion of the House bill now pending and the gentleman from Texas has fifteen minutes in opposition to it.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, Rear-Admiral Harwood was born in Pennsylvania on the 9th of October, 1802. He joined the United States Navy on the 1st of January, 1818, when he was not quite sixteen years of age. He died on the 28th of August, 1884, after a continuous service of sixty-six years. I dare say that there is not to be found in the history of the country a parallel for that service. He left a widow past seventy years of age; he left a maiden daughter; he left the widow of an only son (who died since the war of diseases contracted in the war) with four children. All are living together as one family, and the report of the committee, which I hold in my hand, states in substance that they have been left in indigent circumstances. I never saw Admiral Harwood, or his widow, or any member of his family. I happen to be the friend simply of a brother of his widow, and it was at his request that I introduced this bill and had it referred. I have here the report of the House committee at the present session. Time will not admit of my reading any considerable portion of it, but I will read a few passages:

> The Navy Register shows that he was on active duty, either afloat or ashore, forty-one years.
> Early in his career he attracted the attention and secured the esteem of two of the most distinguished and gallant officers in our naval history.
> As a midshipman, under the command of the celebrated Commodore David Porter, he assisted in the capture of a piratical schooner and her barge in the West Indies. The present head of the Navy, Admiral Porter, then a boy of ten, was with his father at the time, and authorizes the statement that his favorable knowledge of Admiral Harwood began at that time, and continued through the whole course of a service always useful and efficient, and in many respects highly creditable and valuable in its character.

As precedents for this bill we have cited in the report of the House committee the cases of the widows of Rear-Admirals McDougal, Beaumont, Middleton, Stribling, and Sands, and of Commodore Watson, to each of whom a pension of $50 a month was given by acts passed during the first session of the Forty-eighth Congress.

In the report of Senator Blair from the Senate Committee on Pensions upon the Senate bill, which I shall ask to have substituted for this bill, it is stated that this bill is "one of the most meritorious of the class to which it belongs."

Mr. LONG. Will the gentleman state what was this officer's rank?

Mr. ROGERS. He was a rear-admiral.

Mr. LONG. What is the usual rate of pensions allowed in the cases of rear-admirals?

Mr. ROGERS. Fifty dollars a month. That amount has been allowed in twenty-two cases, the references to which I have before me.

Mr. MCMILLIN. What is the pension allowed by law in such cases?

Mr. ROGERS. I can not answer that question.

Mr. PETERS and others. Thirty dollars a month.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Is Mrs. Harwood now receiving a pension of $30 a month?

Mr. ROGERS. She draws no pension now.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Because he was not in active service at the time of his death.

Mr. ROGERS. He was on the retired-list when he died.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Then this bill makes an exception—creates a new class of pensioners?

Mr. ROGERS. No; because I have before me references to twenty-two cases of the same sort in which $50 a month has been allowed.

Mr. DUNHAM. What pension will she receive if this bill be passed?

Mr. ROGERS. Fifty dollars a month.

Mr. LONG. What is the rate of pension which the precedents have established?

Mr. ROGERS. Fifty dollars in every single case.

Mr. LONG. Except this?

Mr. ROGERS. Except this. In every case of this kind which has been passed by Congress—and I have reference to the twenty-two cases—this is the amount that has been allowed.

Mr. LONG. Then I understand the gentleman to say that if the pension in this case were fixed at less than $50 it would be an exception?

Mr. ROGERS. It would be an exception to the general rule.

In the report accompanying the House bill we have cited the cases of the widows of Rear-Admirals McDougal, Beaumont, Middleton, Stribling, and Sands, and of Commodore Watson.

In the report made to the last Congress by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] we have cited bills granting similar pensions in cases of this kind. I read from that report:

> The following instances are cited in which this has been done: In 1876, to the widow of Commodore Elliott; in 1877, to the widows of Admirals Bell and Winslow; in 1878, to the widow of Admiral Wilkes; in 1879, of Commodores Frailey, Gallagher, and McKeever, and of Admiral Stringham; in 1880, of Admiral Davis; in 1881, of Admiral Paulding and of Commodores McCauley and Guest; and finally, last winter and summer, to the widows of Admirals Goldsborough, Hoff, Reynolds, Lardner, Spotts, and Rogers, and Commodore Wood.

During the last Congress there were six additional cases passed. The names of those persons I have not before me. Yes, I have them. They are Admirals Scott and Creighton, Commanders Jeffers and Bissell, Surgeon-General Palmer and Commodore Green.

Mr. Speaker, I will repeat the statement—and I invite the attention of my friend from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] because he did not hear it before—that this gentleman was for sixty-six years in continuous service—nearly all of it active service. There were a few years of those sixty-six years in which he was not in active service. He died in 1884, leaving this widow, now past seventy years of age, with a maiden daughter, and with a widowed daughter whose husband died after service in the late war leaving four children, all living, as this report shows, and in indigent circumstances.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Does not the widowed daughter draw a pension?

Mr. ROGERS. She draws a pension, but she has four children to support upon it.

A MEMBER. How old are the children?

Mr. ROGERS. I do not know the ages of the children. They have been born since the war. These three women live together, constituting one family, with these children to be educated.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Do not the children draw pension if their father died in the service?

Mr. ROGERS. I am not advised as to that. He did not die in the service, but he died since the war from disease contracted in the service.

Several MEMBERS. That is the same thing.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Then I presume the children would be entitled to a pension.

Mr. ROGERS. I presume that is true, though it had not occurred to me.

By the evidence of all the officers who have given their testimony in this matter—among others Admiral Porter, Commodore Luce, Medical Director Lansdale, and Lieutenant Kimball—Admiral Harwood is conceded to have been one of the most useful of all the men connected with the Navy in the particular branches to which the great portion of his life was devoted, namely, the study of ordnance and the writing of a book that has become standard authority connected with the naval service of the United States; and independently of these works he rendered forty-five years of service either on the land or the sea.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, the purpose I had in view, if I could do so, although I have but little hope of accomplishing that purpose, is to break up the line of precedents which I regard as essentially wrong on the subject of the retirement of persons on pay and the pensioning of those not entitled to receive pension under any existing law.

I would be obliged if any gentleman would tell me what is the salary of a rear-admiral in the United States Navy at this time; just at this moment it has passed out of my mind. I believe it is some $6,000 per annum.

Now, I am, of course, unacquainted with the particular facts in this case except as they have been stated by my friend from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS]. I do not know how long this gentleman was a rear-admiral drawing this large salary of $6,000 per annum.

Mr. MCADOO. I will give the honorable gentleman from Texas the information he seeks. The pay of a rear-admiral in the United States Navy while at sea is $6,000 per annum, on shore duty $5,000, and waiting orders $4,000.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman from New Jersey confirms the statement I have made, that the pay of a rear-admiral in the United States Navy is $6,000 per annum while at sea. Now this man was commissioned as a rear-admiral February 20, 1869, and upon that salary a man of reasonable prudence with a family of ordinary size might accumulate a large sum. I know our impulse is to extend benefits to those who have rendered valuable benefits to the country, and especially that our feelings of charity are invoked in behalf of their widows and orphan children. The greatest wrong, in fact, which is being done in our political system is being done from the best of motives. There is an old saying about a certain place being paved with good intentions; this policy also seems to be grounded upon good intentions. The result is that we are creating year by year a very extensive privileged class in this country to be supported out of the toil and labor and sweat of people who are not generally as well off as the beneficiaries of these special laws passed here in this House from time to time. I had to assume the ungracious task the other day of opposing the measure to pension the widow of General Thomas, an officer of as high repute as any who served in the Army of the United States, not because it was pleasant for me to do so, but because I felt it to be my duty to the country and to the people to do so. I oppose this bill too, not because it is pleasant to do so, but because of my conscientious belief that it is utterly and totally wrong and ought to be resisted.

Now, sir, the facts sifted down are just these: A man succeeds in getting a commission in the service of the United States which thousands of his neighbors would be glad to get, but which they can not get. He goes on receiving a larger rate of pay than the great mass of his fellow-citizens can possibly obtain in any position of civil life. He enjoys advantages which his fellow-citizens in private life can not and do not enjoy. Then because we have given him a valuable office, because we have given him higher pay, because we have given him greater privileges, social and otherwise, we assume all these things as the basis and foundation for a proposition to pension all his relatives and support them at the public expense.

Is this right? Under our system of government I undertake to say it is wholly wrong; for our whole system, Mr. Speaker, contemplates that there are to be no privileges extended to one person not extended alike to all others; that there is to be no special, favored, privileged class; in other words, that there is to be no aristocracy like that of monarchical governments of other countries, where the policy is to accumulate large estates, establish great families, grant titles of nobility, and in every other way overshadow and override the great mass of the people. What right has an officer of the Government, of the Army, or the Navy over the citizen who has honestly done his duty, who has performed all that could fairly be demanded of him to the state, who has honestly struggled along in life until old age has overtaken him, and who leaves his family in need if not in poverty—what right, I say, has an officer of the Navy who has during life enjoyed superior advantages—what claim has he upon the Treasury of the United States for the support of his family by the Government when the citizen has equally done all his duties, has been faithful to every trust confided to him—what right has one to have his family pensioned upon the Government which the other does not equally possess? Why should one have such privileges when it is denied to the other? It can only come from the idea, Mr. Speaker; we are to have a privileged class; and I fear we are rapidly drifting into it; we are rapidly producing a nation of mendicants and paupers by means of our pension laws and our retired-list. The pride of our people in early times was in individuality and their reliance was upon the manhood of our citizens. We are educating them now by law, by precedents, by example, to be mendicants and beggars, and we have so far progressed in that evil course that there is pending now a measure to make mendicants and beggars even of the States themselves.

If this is to be the policy of Congress in its legislation, need I say to gentlemen that the time will come, that it must come, when the American people will rise and command a halt in this creation of privileged classes, which must in time give such control of governmental affairs as to transform our whole political system by creating an aristocracy, a privileged class, supported by the toiling and laboring masses, men who are as good, as worthy, as honest, and just as poor as the beneficiary of this bill.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Have they not already done so?

Mr. REAGAN. It is now being done, I will say in answer to my friend from Iowa, but the time will come if this thing continues when the mutterings throughout the land will be plainly heard. I am sorry to be obliged to admit that we are rapidly doing that which is demanding such a rebuke from the people, and it is gradually growing to a greater extent every year. What will be the result of such a system? What must be its inevitable influence? I repeat, sir, its only result is that we are to have an aristocratic class of idlers supported by the toiling people, upon whom they look as a lower order of the human family, unfit altogether for their association, for it is scarcely necessary for me to tell you that these privileged classes hold their heads very high indeed. They never admit that they are pensioners upon the bounty of the people, that they are supported by the toil of other people, but they look upon their payments and emoluments and perquisites as privileges belonging to their class to be paid by the people who do the work and pay the taxes.

I regret to have to protest against such bills. I understand how ungracious such a discrimination appears to be, because there can be always brought forward plenty of reasons which work upon our sympathies. But, sir, I wish I had it in my power to arrest the further progress of such precedents as this, and go back to the policy, the principles, and the pure system of our fathers—that policy which controlled this Government for three-quarters or more of our constitutional existence.

I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN].

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, the law as it now stands is that officers who are placed on the retired-list take that easy berth in lieu of pension; that pension or bounty is not transmitted to those who may be left after their death. The provision allowing them no pension after being retired is a wise and commendable one, and for this reason: They have a large compensation, which is given to them during their lifetime, while they are in the active service of the Government, which is also in old age continued to them. During all of that period they get full pay. After they go out of the active service, after the Government ceases to call upon them for any service, they are placed upon three-quarters pay, and that is considered, I think, equivalent to any compensation given by law to the widows of men, those who sacrificed their lives upon the field of battle. Will we depart from that custom? Is it wise that we should do so?

I admit the gentleman has given precedents here in support of this, and we can find precedents for anything in the shape of Congressional legislation. But I feel the full force of what the gentleman from Texas very well says, that the most unwise thing Congress can do is to legislate in favor of a special class at the expense of the many.

All over the country to-day we have strikes and labor trouble, but we have not begun to see a tithe of the trouble we will experience if by legislation we shall have preferred a class of citizens and placed them above their fellow-men who are compelled to toil for their support. I admit that it looks like a discrimination to stop here and now, but I am firmly of the conviction that we ought to stop and must stop somewhere, and the question is when and where. As is well known, there had been a custom here for years to pay the employés of each outgoing administration of the House offices one month's extra pay. This House denied the wisdom of that custom and refused it. Is it not also time to go forward a step and break up a custom that must be vicious and can be vicious only? By what right, human or divine, do gentlemen propose to single out one widow and make all the balance of the widows toil for her, or one child and make all other children of the Government labor for it?

My friend advocating the bill says that this widow has relatives dependent upon her. Now, it is well known that if there are children over sixteen years old dependent upon a pensioner, under the general pension law they can not be pensioned or be taken into the account in determining the widow's pension. Will we then single out this particular case? We say to the widow whose husband was killed in the Army, under the act recently passed increasing their pensions to $12 a month, "We will give you but $12," while to the widow of a man who has been drawing thousands upon thousands of dollars up to the date of his death we are to give more than four times that. Will we do such injustice? That is the question. One whose life was not lost in the service, one who lived the full measure of his days. Are we to make this exception in favor of his widow? When this officer accepted a place on the retired-list, and year after year drew a good salary while doing no service, he knew that no pension would be allowed his widow, and this Government is under no obligations to do for her what the general law does not provide for others.

Mr. Speaker, I dislike to raise my voice against any individual or any particular case. I know there are hardships involved in all of these cases that come here for relief; but go to every hovel in this land, for which Congress is not asked to legislate, and for which it would not legislate if it were asked, and you will see just as great hardship there. Hardship is everywhere in the land. There is not a member here who can not go among his constituents and see many paupers and thousands of decrepit and destitute people who can not get Government benefaction. Will we discriminate in this case? Is it wise that we should do so? If we do, we simply place one poor person to working for another.

I do not know, sir, what weight any man's objection will have upon this question. We are governed a great deal by sentiment; but I feel it right at least to enter a protest against what seems to be another step in the direction of legislating in favor of a privileged class at the expense of the masses.

I yield the remainder of the time, if any, to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON].

Mr. ROGERS. I have no desire to reply to the arguments of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN]. I sympathize largely with much that has been said by both gentlemen; but neither of them has met the question presented here. Neither of them meets the question. It is, if you have treated all others of this class for years and years in this way what reason there can be that this woman, now past seventy years of age, should be made an exception to the rule? At best she can not live but a little while. This is only for a few years. And we are not giving her $5,000 or $2,000 a year. If this bill passes she gets $600 a year. This is all for this woman past seventy years of age, who is now in a dependent condition and past the age when she can be expected to take care of herself. This is surely not too large a sum.

I will state also that Admiral Harwood was not a rear-admiral for many years. As late as 1855 he was commissioned a captain in the service. In 1862 he was made a commodore and placed on the retired-list. In 1864 he was retired. In 1869, long after he was retired, he was commissioned as rear-admiral on the retired-list. In March, 1869, a month later, he was detached from the Light-House Board and placed on waiting orders. On March 30, 1869, he was ordered as a member of a court-martial at Washington, D. C. In September, 1869, he was detached and ordered to special duty at the Department. In October, 1870, he was appointed judge-advocate of the Navy. In October, 1871, he was detached and placed on waiting orders.

It appears from this record that—

In 1864 Admiral Harwood was placed on the retired-list in accordance with law, but his services were so valuable that he was employed on various special duties till 1872, eight years after retirement, when the law putting all retired officers off duty deprived the Department of his labors. It was during this latter part of his service that he wrote the work on courts-martial, which is at present the accepted authority followed in all military trials in the Navy. Before Harwood's work was published it was almost impossible in the time allowed for naval courts to properly inform themselves on points of law, precedent, and principle, and as a natural consequence much injustice resulted, sometimes in the direction of too great severity, and again in treating breaches of discipline with too great leniency.

It is to Harwood chiefly that the Navy of to-day owes that state of affairs which makes marked injustice in military matters impossible, and gives every man, whatever his rank, his legal rights, and almost inevitably brings adequate punishment for military crime.

I wanted to add that much to his record which I had not time to refer to when I occupied the floor before.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if this pension is granted to Mrs. Harwood, as I have said, she will probably not live more than a few years. It is only $600 a year which she will get under this bill. It is not the pension that was offered to Mrs. Thomas, and which I voted against. It was not the character of pension offered to the granddaughter of Thomas Jefferson, which I voted against. It is not the kind of pension which belongs to the class which gentlemen have been speaking of. But this lady belongs to a class of pensioners whom Congress has recognized uniformly so far as my knowledge extends. It has constantly acted on the principle of granting this amount to the widows of those officers who had achieved that distinction in the service which Admiral Harwood achieved. I think I may say with perfect confidence that no man of these twenty-two in number whom I have mentioned achieved greater distinction or served the country so long or preserved through so many years a record so stainless and pure.

Now will Congress in the face of all these precedents, in the face of these facts which themselves constitute a powerful argument, undertake to draw the line on this woman at her age? She was not married to Admiral Harwood in old age, but was the partner of his life from his early manhood till his death. I hope the House will not undertake to draw the line on her. If it is to establish the precedent contended for, let it be done on some less worthy person than this aged and worthy widow of this singularly distinguished and honorable officer who served his country through the greater part of its existence.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent to lay aside the House bill and to consider the Senate bill in lieu of it. Is there objection?

Mr. REAGAN. I feel constrained to object and to throw every obstacle in the way of passing this bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

The question being taken, there were—ayes 62, noes 58.

Mr. MATSON. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered—43 members voting therefor.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate further insisted upon its amendments numbered 2, 6, and 7 to the bill (H. R. 5893) to provide for certain of the most urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives; agreed to the conference asked on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. ALLISON, Mr. HALE, and Mr. COCKRELL had been appointed the conferees on the part of the Senate.

MARGARET B. HARWOOD.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 96, nays 95, not voting 132; as follows:

So the bill was passed.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, my colleague [Mr. HAMMOND] has requested me to state that he is absent on account of sickness in his family.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the names of members voting be dispensed with.

Objection was made.

After a portion of the names had been read the objection was withdrawn, and the further reading was dispensed with.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. COX with Mr. WHITING, for this day.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia, with Mr. MORROW, for the rest of the day.

Mr. ROBERTSON with Mr. WOODBURN, for this day.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

MRS. LAURA HENTIG.

The next unfinished business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2464) to increase the pension of Mrs. Laura Hentig.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Laura Hentig, widow of Edmund C. Hentig, late a captain in the Sixth Cavalry, United States Army, and to pay her a pension at the rate of $30 per month, in lieu of that now allowed her.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Speaker, I believe debate is in order on this bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised that there was debate upon the bill when it was last before the House.

Mr. MATSON. I desire to be heard in opposition to this bill, and my impression is that there was no debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair may be mistaken. The official record contains the report upon the bill, and the Chair supposed that the report had been read, but perhaps it was inserted without being read.

Mr. MATSON. I think it was inserted in accordance with an agreement that all reports on bills considered should be printed in the RECORD whether they were read or not.

The SPEAKER. If that be the case the rule applies, and there are thirty minutes for debate; fifteen minutes in support of the bill and fifteen minutes in opposition.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Speaker, the vote just taken shows that this House barely tolerates the practice that has obtained in Congress for many years of increasing the pensions of widows of general officers and of officers of corresponding rank in the Navy from $30 to $50 a month. That proposition has been sustained here by a bare majority of 1 upon a yea-and-nay vote. I regard that kind of legislation as the most vicious that could be enacted in relation to pensions. It began, as I have said, a good many years ago.

It began with the proposition that the widows of general officers killed in battle should have their pensions increased from $30 to $50 a month; but it did not stop there. It went on until it grew into a well-founded custom of increasing the pensions of the widows of all general officers to $50 a month. Now, this bill proposes to increase the pension of the widow of a captain—a very worthy man, no doubt, who was killed in battle with the Indians within the last few years. If this bill passes the House will have gone even outside of the line of precedents that has been established here in relation to increasing the pensions of the widows of general officers. This bill clearly goes beyond that line, and certainly every one will agree that it is dangerous for this House to go in this direction beyond the established precedents. I believe with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] that upon the yea-and-nay vote just taken the House ought to have said that vicious legislation of this kind should stop, and that the widow of no officer should have a larger pension than the existing law gives her.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Congress will say so before long.

Mr. MATSON. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that, as just suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN], the time is near at hand when the people will have been heard from upon this question of increasing pensions and granting large special pensions. The practice is growing more unpopular every day all over the country. The people see around them men and women who ought to have pensions but are getting none, and for that reason it is unpopular all through the country to grant large pensions to any one. Therefore I say this House ought to put a stop to the practice, and ought to refuse to increase any of these pensions beyond the limit fixed by law.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him whether the Committee on Invalid Pensions did or did not report against this bill?

Mr. MATSON. This bill does not come from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, but from the Committee on Pensions. This officer was no doubt very worthy, and I do not assail the committee at all. They doubtless believed that this lady was, as she is, the widow of a very gallant and meritorious officer; but the trouble is that there are too many cases just like hers, and the people are not disposed longer to tolerate this practice of giving large pensions to a few favored persons and very small ones to the remainder. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the report of the Committee on Pensions of the Forty-eighth Congress, which fully states the facts in this case, be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The facts in this case are that Capt. Edmund C. Hentig was an officer of the United States Army, on duty with his regiment, the Sixth United States Cavalry, at Fort Apache, Arizona Territory. That on the 29th day of August, 1881, he formed, with his company, a part of the command under Col. E. A. Carr, commanding Sixth Cavalry, United States Army, which marched to Cibicu Creek, near the said Fort Apache, and on the 30th the command was surprised and attacked by hostile Apache Indians, who inflicted serious injury and loss of life upon said command; that at the beginning of the hostilities the said Captain Hentig was shot and instantly killed by said hostile Indians.

Mrs. Laura Hentig, the widow of the said Captain Hentig, has been an invalid for several years, and, from the effects of malaria and the shock of her husband's sudden and cruel death, is suffering from complete nervous prostration; and it is in proof, as the opinion of W. M. Goodell, M. D., of the University of Pennsylvania, that in all probability she will never be able to earn a livelihood for herself or invalid daughter.

Mrs. Hentig is poor, and her present pension of $20 per month is scarcely sufficient to pay for necessary medical attendance. In view of all the surrounding circumstances your committee regard this case as one involving unusual hardships. They would, therefore, recommend the passage of the bill granting a pension to Mrs. Laura Hentig at the rate of $50 per month.

Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Pensions of the present House has reported in favor of the passage of a bill similar to the one presented in the last Congress, fixing the pension in this case at $30 a month. The allegations of that report are sustained by numerous affidavits, which are on file—affidavits of the physicians and others, whose credibility is certified to by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THROCKMORTON], who is familiar with the case. If there ever was a case in which the liberality of the House ought to be exercised it is one of this character.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. What pension is this lady now drawing?

Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR. Twenty dollars a month.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. And the proposition of this bill is to make the pension $50 a month?

Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR. Thirty dollars.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Are there any other widows of captains who receive this amount of pension?

Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR. I do not know whether there are or not. I am not putting this bill on the ground of precedent, but upon the necessity of this special case.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I want to know whether there are any precedents for granting the widow of a captain pension at the rate of $30 a month.

Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR. I am not advised on that point; I think, however, there are.

Mr. WOLFORD. I will say to the gentleman from Iowa that there are ten precedents where $40 a month has been granted.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Where widows of captains are receiving $40 a month?

Mr. WOLFORD. Yes, sir; widows of captains.

Mr. MATSON. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN].

Mr. MCMILLIN. I do not wish to occupy any time upon this case. All I ask is that the yeas and nays be taken on the question of its passage.

The SPEAKER. If no further debate be desired the question is on the passage of the bill, on which the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] asks the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; there being—ayes 34, noes 49; more than one-fifth voting in the affirmative.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. Before the vote is taken I wish to inquire whether the proposition is to increase this pension from $20 to $30 only.

The SPEAKER. The bill provides for a pension of $30 a month.

Mr. MCMILLIN. That is more than the general law provides by 50 per cent.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 68, nays 102, not voting 153; as follows:

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This being Monday, the Chair will proceed to call the States and Territories for the introduction and reference of bills and joint resolutions. Under this call resolutions and memorials of State and Territorial Legislatures are in order; also resolutions of inquiry addressed to heads of Departments.

EDUCATIONAL BILLS.

Mr. WHEELER submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolution directing the Committee on Rules to report a rule to the House by which by a majority vote the House may instruct a committee in charge of a bill to report it back to the House.

Whereas the Tenth Census of the United States shows that there are 6,239,958 persons in the United States over the age of ten years who can not write, and 4,923,451 over ten years of age who can not read; and

Whereas during the first session of the Forty-eighth Congress a bill passed the Senate, by a vote of 33 to 11, to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools; and

Whereas said bill was never acted upon by the House of Representatives; and

Whereas during the present session of Congress, to wit, on the 5th day of March, 1886, the Senate passed another bill to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools by a vote of 36 to 11; and

Whereas said bill was engrossed and reported to the House of Representatives, and on the 9th day of March the Speaker laid before the House the said bill (namely, the bill S. 194) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools, which was read twice and referred to the Committee on Education; and

Whereas on the first day on which bills could be introduced in the present Congress, namely, on the 21st day of December, 1885, bill H. R. 43, to aid in the temporary support of common schools, was introduced, read twice, and referred to the Committee on Education and ordered to be printed; and

Whereas said committee has failed to make any report upon said bill; and

Whereas bills H. R. 134, 142, 900, and 979, which had the same object, were also introduced and referred to the Committee on Education; and

Whereas none of said bills have been reported back to the House by said Committee on Education; and

Whereas the Legislatures of the States of Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, Kentucky, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Virginia, and West Virginia have passed resolutions requesting or directing their Senators and Representatives to aid in securing the passage of bills which seek to aid in the temporary support of common schools; and

Whereas Christian and educational associations throughout the United States have adopted resolutions urging that Congress enact a law providing for the temporary support of common schools; and

Whereas the superintendents of public instruction for the States of Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, Mississippi, Missouri, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Virginia, and West Virginia have memorialized Congress, setting forth the immediate and pressing educational wants of the Southern States of the Union and praying for speedy action in aid thereof; and

Whereas the passage of this bill is absolutely essential to the welfare of the children of citizens who are compelled to labor for low wages in farming and other occupations; and

Whereas the non-action of the Committee on Education indicates that they will not make a report, as contemplated by the rules of the House, in time to secure action by the House during the present session; and

Whereas it is the duty of a committee of this House to consider all bills referred to them and report them back to the House with a statement of their character, accompanied by the recommendation that such as they approve shall be passed and such as they disapprove shall not be passed: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Rules be instructed to report a rule to this House by which it may by a majority vote direct any of its committees to report back any bill referred to them for consideration.

Mr. WILLIS. If the gentleman from Alabama will withdraw his resolution for the present he will have an opportunity next Monday of getting action upon this question without reference to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. WHEELER. I prefer not to withdraw it.

COMMEMORATION OF DECEASED MEMBERS.

Mr. BEACH also presented the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Rules:

Whereas it has always been the custom of this House, when death removes one of its members, to set aside a day when the services and virtues of the departed may be commemorated in a becoming manner;

Whereas, however, there are certain features connected with these memorial services which detract from their solemnity and tend to bring discredit upon this House; and

Whereas during the present Congress, although the session has advanced but a little over three months, there have already been eight occasions when death has hushed the business of this House; and

Whereas in the Forty-seventh Congress there were ten occasions when this House was adjourned upon the preliminary announcement of the death of members, and ten other occasions when the public business gave way for eulogies on the dead, and similar announcements and similar eulogies to a similar extent took place at the other end of the Capitol, so that we had in that Congress alone forty days surrendered in whole or part to commemorate the lives of deceased members; and

Whereas these numerous adjournments were a severe tax upon the public time; and

Whereas on the several occasions to which reference has been made the announcement by the Speaker of the hour for beginning the services has always operated as a signal to vacate these seats, and in a very short time the House was well-nigh deserted, a few only remaining, some to listen and others to finish up the correspondence of the day at their desk; and

Whereas the desertion of the House under the circumstances was not only an act of irreverence to the dead, but an insult to the orators of the occasion, who had taken great pains in the preparation of their eulogies and were entitled to a respectful hearing from their colleagues on this floor; and

Whereas the Sabbath above all others is the day appropriate for such ceremonies, because upon this day our hearts yield more readily to the softening influences and sanctifying lessons which death brings with it; and

Whereas it is believed that if these ceremonies could be conducted on a Sunday (with the floor thrown open to the general public after giving members a reasonable time within which to claim their seats), not only the floor but the galleries would be filled with an attentive and respectful assemblage: Now, therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Rules be directed to report an amendment to the rules so as to require all eulogies hereafter to be delivered on a Sunday, under the direction of the Speaker, and to be accompanied with brief religious services by the Chaplain.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, March 23, 1886.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills, received yesterday from the House of Representatives, were severally read twice, and referred, as indicated below:

A bill (H. R. 1138) to increase the pension of Mary E. Fillebrown; and

A bill (H. R. 5506) granting a pension to Emily Louisa Spicer.

MARGARET B. HARWOOD.

The bill (H. R. 81) granting a pension to Margaret B. Harwood was read the first time by its title.

Mr. BLAIR. That is similar to a bill which has passed the Senate and gone to the House. The House bill is of precisely the same character, word for word, and having been passed by the House, and a similar bill having been considered and reported and passed by the Senate, I ask that this bill be now put upon its passage.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the bill be read at length for information.

The bill was read the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Margaret B. Harwood, widow of Rear-Admiral Andrew A. Harwood, late of the United States Navy, and pay her a pension of $50 a month from and after the passage of this act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill at this time. Is there objection?

Mr. INGALLS. If the bill that has passed the Senate and gone to the House of Representatives should be passed there under the same conditions as this is now asked to be enacted, would it give Mrs. Harwood a pension of a hundred dollars a month?

Mr. BLAIR. I do not so understand it. The members of the House Committee on Pensions explained to me the situation of the matter, and the Senate bill will remain in the possession of that committee, or it may be recalled by the Senate.

Mr. INGALLS. It had better be recalled, I should think.

Mr. BLAIR. I will make that motion as soon as the House bill is disposed of.

Mr. HARRIS. I was going to suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire that he move to recall the bill from the other House, and let the House bill lie on the table until the Senate bill has been returned. I do not suppose there will be any objection to the consideration of the House bill so soon as that difficulty is removed.

Mr. BLAIR. It seems to me that that is hardly a difficulty; and if the Senator from Tennessee would be willing to let this be disposed of I should be much obliged to him.

Mr. HARRIS. I did not object; I simply made the suggestion.

Mr. INGALLS. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas objects to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. BLAIR. I move that the Senate direct the recall of the Senate bill granting a pension to Mrs. Harwood that has gone to the other House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not in order at this time, but if there be no objection by unanimous consent that order will be made.

Mr. MILLER. Let the House bill lie on the table.

Mr. BLAIR. Yes; I move that the House bill lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made if there be no objection.

ALMIRA RUSSELL HANCOCK.

The bill (H. R. 5841) granting a pension to Almira Russell Hancock, widow of Winfield Scott Hancock, late a major-general in the United States Army, was read twice by its title.

Mr. BLAIR. This bill was considered by the Senate Committee on Pensions this morning, and I was instructed by the committee when the bill was laid before the Senate to ask unanimous consent that it be considered and put on its passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill at this time. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The bill is before the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, and will be read at length.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll of the United States the name of Almira Russell Hancock, widow of Winfield Scott Hancock, late a major-general in the United States Army, and to pay her at the rate of $2,000 per annum, to take effect from and after the passage of this act, and subject to all the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

J. M. LOBBAN.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 416) for the relief of J. M. Lobban, which was, after the word "paid," in line 9, to insert:

He shall instruct the Omaha National Bank, of Omaha, Nebr., to pay such check.

Mr. BECK. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate concur in that amendment without its reference to a committee. The Committee on Finance looked over it and agreed to it this morning. Both Houses have passed the bill, but the bank on which the lost check was payable is no longer a depository, and the funds were transferred to the bank at Omaha. The amendment provides for payment there. That is all there is of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the amendment? The Chair hears none. The question is on concurring in the amendment made by the House of Representatives.

The amendment was concurred in.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department, recommending appropriations for certain public buildings named therein; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a memorial of the Trades and Labor Assembly of Cincinnati, Ohio, remonstrating against the passage of the bill (S. 191) for the establishment of an international copyright law, introduced by Mr. HAWLEY, and in favor of the bill on the same subject introduced by Mr. CHACE; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. PLUMB presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Wichita, Kans., praying for the construction by the Government of the Hennepin Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I present the petition of W. W. Clarke, a citizen of Boone County, Iowa, praying for the passage over the President's veto of the bill (S. 150) to quiet the title of settlers on the Des Moines River lands in the State of Iowa. This petitioner is one of the settlers on the Des Moines River lands, so called. The petition, in which he states his case, is brief, and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD, so that Senators may see it.

The petition was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The undersigned, a citizen of Boone County, Iowa, after over three years of service for the Government in the late war, settled on a tract of the Des Moines River land (so called), believing then, as he does now, that the title is in the United States, according to the Harvey settlement, which was approved by the Government and the State. This theory has been sustained by repeated memorials of the State to Congress, asking for a settlement of this title; also by the reports of committees, with one exception, since the Forty-fifth Congress. Twice the action of the House and once the Senate have indorsed it previous to the Forty-ninth Congress, and now, after eight years of struggle, both your honorable bodies having passed Senate bill 150 "to quiet title of settlers on the Des Moines River lands in the State of Iowa, and for other purposes," defeated by a veto of the President.

Believing that the case was misrepresented to him, for no person in his position could afford to veto such a just measure had he known the facts, your petitioner earnestly prays that your honorable bodies will pass the bill over the veto, let the case go to the court as provided in the bill, and settle the title to the homes of over a thousand families of sturdy, hard-working pioneers, hundreds of whom hold patents, pre-emption and homestead papers. Nothing short of this will ever settle the title. We are satisfied to abide by the decision of the highest tribunal that you will pass this and let it go there.

For this your petitioner will ever pray.

W. W. CLARKE.

SHAKOPEE NATIONAL BANK.

Mr. MORRILL. I am directed by the Committee on Finance to report favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 1245) to authorize the increase of the capital stock of the First National Bank of Shakopee, Minn. I ask for its consideration now.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SONE AND FLEMING MANUFACTURING COMPANY.

Mr. MILLER. I am instructed by the Committee on Finance to report favorably without amendment the bill (S. 601) for the relief of the Sone and Fleming Manufacturing Company, limited, of the city of New York. I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read for information.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the Sone and Fleming Manufacturing Company, limited, of the city of New York, the sum of $5,265.73, being the amount of drawback of duties due to them on certain tin cans exported by them but which were not entered for drawback within the time fixed by law, said payment to be made out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is there any report or any recommendation accompanying the bill?

Mr. MILLER. I will say that the bill has passed the Senate twice heretofore, having been reported in the Forty-seventh and Forty-eighth Congresses, but failed to receive action in the other House. It has been reported favorably by the Committee on Claims at this session of Congress, and at the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee on Finance [Mr. MORRILL] upon that report the bill was sent to the Committee on Finance, which now reports it back favorably.

There is a written report in the matter made from the Committee on Claims by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], and a former report made by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER].

The facts in the case are very briefly stated. Under the law the payment of drawback——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be objection to the present consideration of the bill no debate is in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. I shall make no objection when I hear the explanation, I presume.

Mr. MILLER. The clerk of this company proved a defaulter. The usual notices which are required to be filed in the custom-house when goods are exported in order to claim the drawback were made out regularly in the office of the company, the custom-house clerk was furnished with the notices and the money which was required as a fee to be deposited at the custom-house when the entry was made. This clerk, for a period of two or three months, the time which the bill covers, destroyed the notices and kept the money. As soon as it was discovered that the money had not been paid at the custom-house and entries filed, of course the clerk was discharged. Application was made to the Secretary of the Treasury to have this drawback allowed, but under the law, as the notices had not been properly filed, it could not be done, and hence the company comes here for relief from Congress.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REPRINTING OF A REPORT.

Mr. MAXEY. On the 11th of February I reported on behalf of the Committee on Indian Affairs a bill (S. 220) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to settle the claims of S. W. Marston, late United States Indian agent at Union agency, Indian Territory, for services and expenses. I find on examination that the report as printed does not express the views of the committee. I have changed it the way it should be, and in that shape I ask that it may be reprinted. I have no doubt it is my own mistake, and not the mistake of the Printer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, an order will be entered to reprint the report indicated.

Mr. MAXEY introduced a bill (S. 1954) for the relief of Eli Ayres; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. MAXEY. This bill might properly go to the Committee on Claims—it might go to several committees, but upon examination I think that is the proper committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER introduced a bill (S. 1955) for the relief of Nicholas White; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

of section 1094 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that he had, on the 22d instant, approved and signed the bill (S. 163) releasing the estate of the late Frank Soulé, late collector of internal revenue for the first district of the State of California, and his sureties on his official bond.

Ordered, That the papers relating to the case of Nicholas White be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

BONDS HELD BY NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. INGALLS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform the Senate how many of the $10,000,000 United States bonds called for payment May 1 are held by national banks.

SENATE RULES AND MANUAL.

Mr. INGALLS submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That 1,000 additional copies of Senate Rules and Manual be printed for the use of the Senate.

PRICE OF GAS IN WASHINGTON.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be directed to report a bill providing that the price of gas furnished by the Washington Gaslight Company shall not exceed $1 per thousand cubic feet.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. INGALLS. We have no data on which to agree to that resolution. I dare say the price of gas is too high, but whether a dollar would be too low or not I am sure nobody knows.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I suggest then that the resolution lie over until to-morrow, when I shall endeavor to furnish the Senator with some information on the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the resolution lies over under the rule.

ELECTRICAL CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. MANDERSON. By the request of the Secretary of State I offer a concurrent resolution for reference to the Committee on Printing.

The concurrent resolution was read, and referred to the Committee on Printing, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed and bound in cloth 2,500 additional copies of the report of the electrical conference at Philadelphia in 1884, being Senate Executive Document No. 45, Forty-ninth Congress, first session, for the use of the Department of State.

REMOVAL OF FOURTH-CLASS POSTMASTERS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution which comes over from yesterday.

The resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. INGALLS was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be directed to inform the Senate whether he received the resolution of March 4, calling for information as to the number of fourth-class postmasters removed in each of the States and Territories since March 4, 1885, and if said resolution has been received, why it has not been answered, and when a response may be expected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

PLANTS AND SHRUBS FOR PENSION BUILDING.

Mr. BECK. I desire to call up a motion I entered some time ago to reconsider the vote on House joint resolution No. 71, which has passed both Houses, for the purpose of saying that after a good deal of investigation and communication with General Meigs and others relative to the placing of flowers in the large new building known as the Pension Office I have become convinced that the resolution ought to pass. Therefore I ask leave to withdraw the motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky asks leave to withdraw the motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate passed the joint resolution (H. Res. 71) authorizing the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds in the District of Columbia to supply plants and shrubs to fill certain vases in the Pension building. If there be no objection the motion to reconsider is withdrawn.

COIN DUTIES ON IMPORTED GOODS.

Mr. BECK. On the 18th of December, 1885, I offered a resolution, Miscellaneous Document No. 16, Order of Business on the Calendar No. 13, relative to the payment of customs dues and the disbursements thereof, which has been argued very elaborately. I desire to have the resolution referred to the Committee on Finance. I suppose the discussion is all over now, and the resolution is still on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the resolution will be referred to the Committee on Finance. There being no objection, the order is made.

CINNABAR AND CLARKE'S FORK RAILROAD.

Mr. MANDERSON. I desire to make a motion in reference to a bill on the Calendar. I move that Order of Business No. 316, being the bill (S. 980) granting the right of way to the Cinnabar and Clarke's Fork Railroad Company, reported with an amendment by the Committee on Railroads, be referred to the Committee on Territories for their consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the bill will be referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. SAWYER. I do not see why that should be done. I do not know why the Committee on Territories have anything to do with the matter.

Mr. MANDERSON. I think the reason for it will be manifest when I call the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin to the nature of the bill. It is to build a railroad through the Yellowstone Park.

Mr. SAWYER. Just across one corner of it.

Mr. MANDERSON. The road is to run from 25 to 45 miles, variously estimated, through the Yellowstone Park, and the subject-matter of the Yellowstone Park has always been referred to the Committee on Territories. That committee have already had under consideration the advisability of building railroads through the park, and it seems to me that this is a very appropriate reference. I make the motion by the unanimous request of the Committee on Territories, who have the subject-matter under consideration.

Mr. SAWYER. Very well; I shall not oppose the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There being no objection, the reference will be made to the Committee on Territories.

EFFICIENCY OF THE ARMY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate, by the unanimous order of yesterday, Senate bill No. 777, being the unfinished business of the morning hour.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 777) to increase the efficiency of the Army of the United States, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. HALE to strike out section 2 of the bill.

Mr. MANDERSON. Mr. President, I do not desire to detain the Senate from final action upon this bill or to do anything in the nature of speech-making; but it is my desire to correct some of the erroneous statements made by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]—statements made by him erroneously, I say, but simply so because, as suggested by himself, he has not had the opportunity to give that consideration to the matters involved in the second section and collateral to it that he would like. The Senator from Maine presented the report of a subcommittee of the Committee on Military Affairs showing the testimony of Army officers taken by it in the year 1874, and, as I understood his suggestion, it was that as the result of the deliberations of that committee in 1874 there was a change of conviction on the part of these prominent officers of the Army of the United States, and that they believed, as the committee and as Congress seemed to believe in 1874, that twenty-five thousand enlisted men was a sufficient force for the Army of the United States. I have here a little later authority from gentlemen who are distinguished in the Army from testimony taken by another committee of the Congress of the United States in 1878.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator permit me to correct him?

Mr. MANDERSON. Certainly, I shall be glad to be corrected if I misapprehend the Senator.

Mr. HALE. I did not yesterday in any way attempt to show that the Army officers at the time the Senator alluded to had come to the conclusion that twenty-five thousand enlisted men were enough in their judgment, but I did say, and that was all I intended to say, that the result of the investigation which called forth the opinions of Army officers was that Congress limited the number to twenty-five thousand men, whatever may have been the opinion of Army officers; and I very well know that at that time and since then many Army officers have expressed the opinion that thirty thousand men are not too much. That is all I intended to show.

Mr. MANDERSON. I thought the Senator went further than that statement in his remarks of yesterday, and I am glad to know that I misapprehended his view in that matter. But I desire to call the attention of the Senate to some important testimony taken before the committee in 1878 with reference to the number of enlisted men required in the Army of the United States. I read first from the letter of General Schofield of January 3, 1878, showing what his view was after the experiment of twenty-five thousand enlisted men had been tried for four years.

I have to remark that a force consisting of even the largest number named—

Thirty thousand enlisted men—and scattered in small detachments over so vast a territory as ours, must be regarded rather as a military police than as an army. In such a force any simple, effective organization is about as good as any other; certainly the present organization of our Army is so much more satisfactory than its effective strength, that I am unable to think of any change in the former (i. e., organization) which would be worth consideration so long as its effective strength remains as it is.

And in the same letter he says:

A force of fifteen or twenty thousand men is so manifestly inadequate to the military necessities of the country, that I dare not venture to suggest what should be the strength of each arm.

Some important interests must be left without protection.

I would suggest that a good modification of the present organization of the Army, to suit an aggregate strength of from twenty-five or thirty to fifty thousand men, that the number of regiments in each arm remain as now fixed by law, that each regiment shall be composed of twelve companies, &c.

The expenses of the Army are very great in proportion to its strength, but this is because the Army is scattered over a vast territory and is expected to perform as much service as twice the number of men ought to be required to perform. This entails great expense in the transportation of troops and great loss and destruction of property, &c. We display just enough force in the vicinity of Indian tribes to provoke their contempt.

It seems to me that, as intimated by General Schofield, in the interest of true economy, for the purpose of saving in the matter of transportation of troops, an increase of the Army from the present force to thirty thousand, as provided by this section, would be very desirable. General Pope, about the same date, January 2, 1878, says:

I presume I state a general belief, and certainly it is my own, that the Army is not now large enough for the service which it is obliged to perform. I might sustain this by citing many facts. Without undertaking to specify what I consider a sufficient force, I may say, I think without contradiction by those familiar with the service required of the Army, that twenty-five thousad men is much too small a force for the needs of the country.

January 24, 1878, General O. O. Howard writes to this committee:

I will assume as a basis for my answers an army of an aggregate total of twenty-five thousand men. I deem it an impossibility to garrison our frontier and seacoast with a less force than that, and that number of men would hardly form military leaven sufficient to affect such an army as will be the next one we shall have to call into the field. A larger force would be more desirable and would make each subdivision more efficient.

Adjutant-General Townsend, January 4, 1878, to the same committee, says:

In general I consider the present organization of the Army simple and effective, except that more enlisted men are imperatively needed.

Mr. President, I might go on reading from other letters and from the testimony of other soldiers prominent in the military service to show that thirty thousand men has been considered by them insufficient for the purposes of the Government.

The Senator from Maine referred somewhat to the needs for an army in this country and to its distribution. I desire to call his attention to this fact, that to my mind is an alarming one, when we come to consider some of the circumstances that are threatening the peace of this country. The military division of the East, commanded by General Hancock until his death, is composed of a large number of States, and I would call attention to what they are. It consists of the New England States, the States of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Louisiana, Arkansas, Mississippi, Alabama, Kentucky, Tennessee, Ohio, Michigan, Wisconsin, Indiana, and the District of Columbia. And by the report made by General Hancock before his death to the War Department it is shown that the number of troops in all this vast department, with its tremendous interests, with its immense lines of seacoast subject to defense to a large degree by the Army of the United States in the garrisoning of forts, &c., is only one general officer, a general staff, consisting of 63 commissioned officers and 118 enlisted men; artillery consisting of 211 commissioned officers and 1,788 enlisted men, and infantry 60 commissioned officers and 739 enlisted men. So that for the protection of this vast military department there are but 2,645 enlisted men of all arms. The principle of self-defense alone ought to prompt us to take measures for the enlargement, in some degree at least, of the number of the Army of the United States that shall be apportioned to the mighty demands of the Department of the East.

True it is that a large proportion of the present Army is west of the Mississippi River and properly so. The Senator from Maine suggests that there is but little for the Army of the United States to do west of the Mississippi River. He referred to the late report of the Secretary of the Interior upon the Indian question, and read somewhat, I believe, from the reports of others concerning the condition of the Indian in the West. As I remember his statement, it was that in no part of the country would it be possible to gather two or three thousand armed Indians to make warfare against the settlers upon the frontier. Indeed, I think his assertion was so strong as this, that in the last several years not even one hundred and fifty armed Indians had been found at any one time or any one place upon the war-path.

Mr. President, I live and have lived for nearly twenty years in a frontier State. Upon the northern border of the State of Nebraska there is the immense Sioux reservation; 36,000 square miles of territory devoted, as I suggested a few weeks ago, to the abuse rather than the use of these Indians. The number of those occupying this section of country is variously estimated at from twenty-three to twenty-eight thousand. I am informed by the Senator from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, that in his opinion the population of the Sioux Nation is about 28,000. The fighting Indian is any adult Indian, you may almost say without distinction of sex, over the age of fifteen or sixteen years, for the terrible experience of the frontier has shown that as a soldier fighting according to the Indian idea the squaw is about as effective as the male Indian.

During last summer it was my privilege to visit the great Sioux Nation, and I went to several of the agencies established thereon. The estimate given me by the agents in charge of the different tribes of the Sioux Nation was that of male Indians of the combative age, meaning over fifteen or sixteen years of age, there certainly were upon the Sioux reservation from eight to ten thousand. I believe it to be an overestimate, but I have no question of the fact that the Sioux Nation, if it should go to war with the whites, could place upon the war-path not less than five to six thousand effective Indian soldiers.

The Senator from Maine, I think, does not appreciate the condition of affairs in that country. It is true that the Sioux as well as other Indians are making some progress toward civilization; but while we are teaching them some things that are good, we are teaching them many other things that are bad. We are teaching them to be better fighters than they were even ten years ago, at the time of the Custer massacre.

As I went over the Sioux reservation during last fall I was surprised, I may say that I was frightened, to see that nearly every male Indian of adult years was armed with that most effective of magazine-guns the Winchester rifle; and when it comes to combat it makes very little difference whether the man who holds the Winchester rifle in his hands is the red man or the white man—it is truly a most dangerous weapon.

Mr. HALE. Let me ask the Senator one question here.

Mr. MANDERSON. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. I suppose the Senator's statement as to the number of the Sioux tribe may be correct; but in the last two or three years has this tribe in any way been engaged in any outrage or hostilites, in any depredations, in anything that has caused a need for the United States troops to enter into any conflict with this tribe? And does the Senator know—calling his attention to what I said yesterday—of any case in the last two or three years where one hundred and fifty or two hundred Indian braves armed have been found together in any one place on the war-path?

Mr. MANDERSON. I will try to answer the Senator from Maine, and I answer him by that perhaps which is better than my own knowledge of facts, by some of the reports of the general officers commanding in that section of country.

But however that may be—and I shall come to it in a moment—the savage-man material is in existence there to give to the frontier settlers of Nebraska and to the frontier settlers of all the Northwest a most terrible infliction. The braves are there, and are actuated by the same desire to distinguish themselves in battle with the whites that actuated those who fought at the Custer massacre. During my late visit I went among them. I witnessed two or three of their wild dances around the campfire. One I remember particularly, one incident, and I wish that the Senator from Maine could have been there to have witnessed it with me. It was at the Pine Ridge agency, and several thousand Indians had gathered as spectators of the dances. There were perhaps fifteen or twenty dancers, dressed, or perhaps it would be more true to the facts to say undressed, to that condition which they assume when they are about to execute these famous dances. There I saw in most expressive pantomime the Custer fight from the Indian standpoint. A brave of about forty-five or fifty years of age, stalwart and strong, having danced for some time was given the field, and with gesture that was most eloquent and expressive showed how he had fought in the Custer fight and how he had taken the scalps of numerous white men, the only monument remaining of their ever having existed being the notches upon his war-club showing the number he had killed. And what else did I see? There were hundreds of young men from the age of fifteen to twenty-five drinking in this exhibition with admiration, and evidently desirous that the time should come when they too might distinguish themselves and show similar prowess. So not only is the material there for warfare, but the disposition is there to take the war-path at any provocation, real or imagined.

I am not an alarmist, Mr. President, and am not alone in my apprehension of danger. As it happens, within a week past I have received a letter, dated March 14, 1886, from the commander at Fort Niobrara, one of the two forts stationed on the flanks of this great Sioux Nation, and I will read an extract from it:

Of course it is only a question of time until we have trouble with Red Cloud and his bands, eight thousand of whom are near Robinson. This border of Nebraska is very imperfectly protected, and I feel very anxious that the people of Northwest Nebraska should be better protected. I have during the past year enlarged and strengthened this post. There are seventeen thousand Indians (Sioux) near Fort Niobrara and Fort Robinson, and, as we are now situated, if an outbreak was to occur the whole of Northwestern Nebraska would be overrun and destroyed.

A very different condition of things exists in that country now from that which existed a few years ago when these Sioux tribes were gathered from throughout all the Northwest and placed upon these lands. When they were placed there the surrounding country was a wilderness; no white man lived within many miles of the border lines of the Sioux reservation a few years ago; but within two years there has pushed forward into that northwestern country the pioneer of the white man's civilization, the railroad, and situated upon it are many lovely town and villages, settled by a people certainly worthy of protection, in intelligence the peers of any other. The surrounding public lands have been opened to settlers, and thousands and thousands of men, women, and children have gone into that northwestern part of my State, and are there settled. They are within but a few miles of this Sioux reservation, and I say to the Senator from Maine, basing my statement upon actual observation and from reports of military men who are not alarmists, that those men, women, and children live in constant alarm and in deadly fear from the fact that the only protection they have is the United States soldiers stationed in the vicinity, too few in number to afford them the safety that should be assured.

Fort Robinson and Fort Niobrara are the two posts that are on the flanks of this Sioux Nation. Let me call the attention of the Senate to the number of troops stationed there. I can give them, I think, without looking at the report. At Fort Niobrara there are two hundred and sixty officers and men; at Fort Robinson less than three hundred officers and men; so that there are not over six hundred soldiers of the United States at these two forts for the protection of the people of this frontier.

Mr. PLATT. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. MANDERSON. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT. I have from the Adjutant-General a statement of the garrisons at the different posts on February 28.

Mr. MANDERSON. I wish the Senator would read it.

Mr. PLATT. At Fort Niobrara there are officers and men two hundred and eighty-five; at Fort Robinson two hundred and nine—less than five hundred at both.

Mr. MANDERSON. So that the total would be about as I stated. There are really less than five hundred soldiers at these two forts.

Mr. TELLER. Allow me to say that it does not follow because there are only two hundred and fifty men at that point that the Government could not have, if it desired, other soldiers there. To my certain knowledge there are at Fort Lyon some troops where there is not any more necessity for them than in the city of Washington.

Mr. MANDERSON. Quite likely. I think some of the smaller posts on the frontier might be abandoned with safety.

Mr. HALE. I do not like to interrupt the Senator, but sometimes we get at the real condition of things better by a colloquy.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am very glad to hear the Senator.

Mr. HALE. The condition the Senator has pictured I suppose is one thoroughly known and appreciated in the War Department. Now, is there anything found in the report of the Secretary of War made to Congress giving information as to the entire situation, or in the report of the General of the Army, in the last year or the year before or the year before that, which in any way invoked the interposition of Congress for an added force in the Army of the United States to meet what the Senator so graphically pictures as an ever-present danger?

Mr. MANDERSON. There is, and I will show it to the Senator.

Mr. HALE. I shall be very glad if the Senator will show in any of these reports during the times covered by the period I have stated anything of that sort, because I have missed it.

Mr. MANDERSON. I will give you very late authority. I will give you extracts from the report of the Secretary of War and accompanying papers of this year. In the very nature of things in the brief report that would be made by the Secretary of War he does not go into any great degree of detail, neither does the Lieutenant-General of the Army.

Mr. HALE. Does he ask for more men in the Army?

Mr. MANDERSON. Does the Secretary of War?

Mr. HALE. Yes; in the last report.

Mr. MANDERSON. I think he does.

Mr. HALE. In the last report?

Mr. MANDERSON. He does by his recommendation, as I will show to the Senator. He urges that the present regiments of infantry be increased to twelve companies of fifty men each. That means an increase of enlisted men of twenty-five hundred.

Mr. HALE. I know the general proposition as to the reorganization of the Army, but does not the Senator know that for the last three years or more, under the conditions that Indian warfare has assumed, under the suppression of Indian wars and the lack of immediate danger, that the petition which was continually before that time sent here from the Department for an increase of the enlisted men of the Army has been abandoned?

Mr. MANDERSON. No, I do not know that, and I do know the contrary, as I will show the Senator from Maine. In the very nature of things—for the best authority upon this question as to the condition of the Indians in the Division of the Missouri, which division includes all the military departments in that great Northwest—we should go to the report of the efficient commander of the Division of the Missouri, General Schofield, and I commend his report to the Senator from Maine. Let us see what he says on the subject of the Indian danger and on the subject of a proper increase of the Army of the United States. Mark it, the great bulk of the troops of the Army of the United States are in that division. The troops serving in this division are nineteen regiments of infantry, seven regiments of cavalry, and four batteries of artillery; in round numbers nine thousand five hundred infantry, five thousand six hundred cavalry, and two hundred and eighty artillery; aggregate fifteen thousand men. So that fifteen thousand out of the twenty-five thousand are within the military division commanded by General Schofield, and he gives here their different dispositions.

> The total infantry force now available for the occupation of posts near the Indians is about eight thousand men, or less than one-third the number of Indian warriors in their vicinity. Hence it is manifest that the dismounted force is barely sufficient to guard the military posts, Indian agencies, railroads, and other property of great value against destruction by hostile Indians, leaving no foot troops available for other service either in the Indian country or elsewhere. The five regiments of cavalry available for immediate service against hostile Indians in this division number about four thousand men, or less than one-sixth the number of Indian warriors.

Now he describes the condition of the Indians:

> The Indians are well mounted, having several ponies to each man, well armed, and abundantly supplied with ammunition.

The proposition has been frequently made in Congress, and it is one that meets with my hearty approval, to disarm the Indians of this country. But I venture the prediction that when that is undertaken if you had every available man of the Army of the United States you could not enforce the decree of Congress, and I think the Senator from Massachusetts, who knows the Indian condition pretty well, will indorse that proposition. It would mean a bloody warfare involving our whole border.

> Being trained from early childhood, they are excellent horsemen and expert marksmen, equal in these respects to the best regular troops in the world.

And yet in Schofield's division there are of cavalry less than one-sixth of the number of Indian warriors, and of infantry less than one-third the number to protect against outbreaks sure to occur.

> It is manifestly impossible to permanently overawe and hold in subjection such bodies of savages by the show of any force far inferior to them in numbers. If information of the threatened outbreak of any tribe is obtained in time, it may be prevented by the rapid concentration of troops by rail. This has been done in several instances, as in that of the Cheyennes last summer.

It is the history of all Indian wars that when one tribe takes the warpath others are very apt to follow; and General Schofield suggests:

> But if two or three tribes become disaffected at the same time, or any tribe takes advantage of the temporary absence of troops, as they frequently do, to manifest their latent hostility, it may be impossible to prevent a general uprising, which must result in a vast destruction of life and property.

Here let me call the attention of my friend from Maine to one instance during the last year. I was in Wyoming Territory after that terrible Rock Springs outrage upon the Chinese, and the repetition of that outrage when the Chinese came back to that section of country was only prevented by the presence of a handful of United States troops that overawed the rioters who had committed this terrible crime. The reason that there were not more—when more troops were needed and when more were called for by General McCook, who was in command, and when General Howard at Omaha desired to send them to the aid of those already at Rock Springs—was that he was prevented from doing so by the threat of Red Cloud and his bands in the Sioux Nation to promote disaffection because of the antagonism between them and the Indian agent, Dr. McGillicuddy. These troops had to be kept at Niobrara and Robinson and Laramie for that purpose, making such show of power as their meager numbers would permit.

General Schofield proceeds:

> Considerable progress has doubtless been made towards the civilization of some of the tribes. But their savage nature has not yet been greatly changed, and their love of war is not yet greatly diminished, while the temptations to engage in hostilities and the opportunities to do injury have been vastly increased. The reservations are now surrounded by great herds of horses and cattle, and by vast fields of wheat and corn, and thousands of defenseless settlers. When the lapse of a few years has dulled the recollection of past punishment, only a slight provocation will be needed to induce the young warriors to yield to such tempting opportunities to satiate their native thirst for blood and plunder, and their brutal lust.

Mr. President, the savage nature of these Indians is not yet changed. You can not, in the very nature of things, take these brutal savages and in a few years, even with the best adjuncts of civilization, with the church and the school, convert them into that civilized condition in which we would like to have them. We must treat them as we find them until there are changed conditions. They are still total savages, with all the instincts of the wild Indian, with his thrist for blood.

> The great majority of the large frontier population are strangers to the earlier history of the Indian country. They have settled there since the Indians were located upon reservations. Relying upon Government protection, they are apparently unconscious of any danger, while in simple truth they are liable at any moment to experience all the horrors of savage warfare.
> Nothing short of the immediate presence of a superior force can be relied upon to restrain the Indians from outbreak, until they have advanced far beyond their present stage of civilization. Of course troops could soon be concentrated to subdue any rebellious tribe. But the damage which might be done, even in the time required for this purpose, would be enormous, as compared with anything in our past experience of Indian wars.

And this brings me to the consideration, if I may be pardoned for a moment's digression, to another proposition made by the Senator from Maine yesterday, that the "mere stamp of the foot" of some one, perhaps of the Chief Executive of this country, would bring into being a body of men that would crush out any enemy, whether domestic or foreign. We tried that experiment once, Mr. President, and a few weeks ago in a speech that I delivered here on the subject of the three-battalion bill I quoted from General McClellan to show how expensive the experiment had been. I venture the assertion that if at the outbreak of the war of the rebellion the Army of the United States had been fifty thousand armed and equipped men even that terrible war might have been averted. Certainly we should have been in a position to have taken the field with an army composed of regulars and volunteers that would have been fairly efficient, and would have prevented the terrible loss of life and of treasure incident to the early years of the war. There is no wiser motto than that which says, "In time of peace prepare for war;" and I say to prepare the country for war means not only that the Army of the United States should be made efficient, but that it should be reasonably increased, so that it shall be at least a police force adequate to the great demand of this growing country with nearly sixty millions of people.

General Schofield says:

The number of Indians in this division, as reported by the Interior Department, is about 175,000. Of these about 53,000 are rated as peaceable, the remaining 122,000 being more or less uncivilized and warlike. Their warriors number at least 25,000—equal to the entire strength of the United States Army, or two-thirds more than the whole number of troops serving in this division.

It is manifest that this numerically smaller force of troops can not absolutely prevent Indian outbreaks in the future, as it has not in the past. The probabilities of such outbreaks may have diminished in the last few years, and undoubtedly the facilities for suppressing them have greatly increased by means of the rapid transportation of troops by rail. But the question to be now considered is, whether the vast increase of the interests of life and property involved does not now demand that such military measures be adopted as will surely prevent in the future any wholesale destruction of life and property by the uncivilized tribes of the country. It is my duty to plainly and clearly present this question for the consideration of the authorities upon whom the responsibility of action finally rests.

He goes on to treat of the subject somewhat in detail. Now let me read to the Senator from Maine a section from this report of General Schofield on the subject-matter of the increase of the Army of the United States:

I desire to pointedly invite attention to the fact that, while our present force can by concentration subdue any rebellious tribe, as has so often been done heretofore, the warlike tribes are no less prepared for war now than they have been at any former period, and that our present military force is manifestly insufficient to prevent or promptly suppress Indian outbreaks.

I beg leave to submit that, in a country of fifty millions of people, fifty thousand men would be a small army to be maintained with sole reference to possible foreign wars. But when the country has constant daily use for nine-tenths of that force to protect its people and their property against destruction by savage tribes in their midst, it is extremely unwise to limit the Army to its present strength. As well might the great cities of the country limit their police force to one-half that which experience has shown to be necessary for daily service, with no reserve for great emergencies.

So I might continue to read to the Senator from Maine that which it seems to me would be exceedingly instructive upon this question. I regret the fact that it has not been the opportunity of the Senator to go into that Western country and see how vast the interests are that need protection and how great the dangers are that threaten them.

Why, Mr. President, we of Nebraska are not alone in this matter of dangerous exposure. Our adjoining State of Kansas is evidently somewhat alarmed and was considerably agitated during last summer by a threatened Indian uprising. I have a bill before me now under consideration by the Committee on Military Affairs introduced by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] providing that—

The sum of $250,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and hereby is, appropriated for the purchase of the necessary grounds and the erection thereon of two military posts or garrisons at such points on or near the southern frontier of Kansas, adjacent to the Indian Territory, as may be, in the judgment of the Secretary of War, best adapted for the protection of the citizens of Kansas from the hostile incursions of the various Indian tribes congregated in that region.

This is not the resurrection of some old bill for mere dress parade. It is here for the purpose of becoming a law, and it is backed up by a memorial to the Congress of the United States from the Legislature of Kansas, introduced on March 1 by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], in which the Legislature of Kansas pray:

That our Senators and Members of Congress be, and are hereby, requested to use their utmost endeavors to secure the establishment by the United States Government, on the southwestern frontier of Kansas, not less than two military posts, sufficiently garrisoned with troops to insure protection to the citizens of the southwestern portion of the State.

This is not an imaginary danger upon the southern border of Kansas any more than it is an imaginary danger upon the northern border of Nebraska; and I say to the Senator from Maine, when he suggests that we can meet these outbreaks by the action of the citizens of that section, that those poor settlers of Northwestern Nebraska hardly have money enough to buy themselves a plow to cultivate the ground and the other implements of husbandry, and do not think for a moment of aspiring, as does the neighboring Sioux, to the luxury of a Winchester rifle. When he suggests that these settlers can resist the raids of these savages upon their homes and women and children, he might as well talk of resisting an attack by a foreign ironclad upon the coast of Maine by the fishing-smacks of his own State.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I am not a member of the Military Committee, and therefore am not advised in regard to the merits of the details relative to the organization of the Army as proposed in the bill, but I can not help thinking that the provision which seeks to increase the Army of the United States at this time from twenty-five thousand to thirty thousand men is either very unnecessary, or we have been taking very needless risks in all the years gone by.

The Indian question can surely be managed quite as well now as it ever could. We have more railroads, more telegraph lines, more facilities for reaching all the different points where Indian troubles can spring up than we ever had. Outside of the Indian problem the country is at absolute peace, with no disturbing element in view, so that there can be no reason for an increase of the Army outside of the necessities of Indian warfare. I repeat, that with the increased railroad facilities, the increased means of receiving prompt information from all the points where difficulties can possibly be expected by means of the telegraph and all other means of rapid communication, if the Army of the United States has been sufficient in all the years gone by, surely it must be large enough now.

The Senator from Nebraska seems to think that great dangers threaten us now. I never heard these dangers suggested before; certainly the trouble is not greater than it has been for some years past; and as a friend of this administration I should regard it as the most fatal blunder it could commit to increase the expenditures of the Government by increasing the Army of the United States, and prevent by reason of those increased expenditures the reduction of taxation on the people for no better reason that I can see than because a few officers of the United States Army, who of course desire to magnify their position, who have always desired a larger standing Army than we have now, tell us that we ought to place more men under their command than they have at present.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me a word right there, because I suppose we all want to get at the facts?

Mr. BECK. I yield.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator is mistaken about this section increasing the Army, except so far as the number of soldiers is concerned.

Mr. BECK. That is what I object to.

Mr. LOGAN. It does not increase the regiments or officers; and, if the Senator will remember, the law was in the reorganization; I call his attention to it, so that in the discussion we may understand one another, that so far as enlisted men are concerned the Army shall not be increased beyond thirty thousand. That was the law, and the reduction to twenty-five thousand men has been made, as the Senator well knows, on appropriation bills and otherwise, by cutting off the enlisted men. Thirty thousand ought now, as then, to be thirty thousand.

Mr. HALE. The Senator will allow me a moment.

Mr. LOGAN. I did not desire to interrupt any one, but only to call the attention of the Senator from Kentucky to one fact.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Illinois is commonly very correct on all matters touching the military establishment. There is no Senator who has given more time and attention to the subject than he. But in this he is entirely wrong. The Revised Statutes of 1873, which make the body of general laws that we have and which are the last revision, fixed the limit of the Army at thirty thousand men undoubtedly. But immediately following the acceptance and adoption of the Revised Statutes, which fixed the limit at thirty thousand men, Congress comes in and in terms declares that after that time the limit of the Army shall be twenty-five thousand men, and the provision that the Senator refers to, which he undoubtedly finds in the Revised Statutes, has been repealed by clauses upon the appropriation bills, not pertaining merely to the particular appropriation bills as they run but as enacted law, and changing the limitation. There is no authority to-day for the Secretary of War to receive as enlisted men into the Army one man over twenty-five thousand. In fact, in terms he is forbidden to do that.

Mr. LOGAN. I stated so. I said we had done that. The limit by the statute was thirty thousand, but by our action on appropriation bills we had changed it so that no enlistment could be made beyond twenty-five thousand.

Mr. HALE. We have changed the limitation. That is not the law to-day.

Mr. LOGAN. We will not discuss that.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I happened to be a member of the Appropriations Committee when all those things were discussed time and again, and the Senator from Maine states the case, as I understood it, with absolute correctness when he asserts that twenty-five thousand men is now the limit, and the appropriation bills not only provided for one year, but for all future years. So the law has been and will continue unless this section is inserted. Section 2 of the bill proposes to authorize an increase up to thirty thousand men. If that is not needed to change existing law I see no use for section 2 of this bill, which reads thus:

SEC. 2. That the number of enlisted men in the Army, including an engineer battalion of five hundred and twenty men, hospital stewards, and one thousand Indian scouts, be, and hereby is, established as a force not to exceed thirty thousand men.

If thirty thousand men can be enlisted by law now, as suggested by the Senator from Illinois, why re-enact it? It is proposed because that is not the law now; no matter whether it was enacted in appropriation bills or any other class of bills, twenty-five thousand is the limit up to which the Secretary of War or the General of the Army or any other authority can enlist men, and the proposed section is required to increase it.

Mr. LOGAN. I may have been in the language I used a little uncertain; but I stated that by and with the action and consent of the Senator himself on the Appropriations Committee we had changed the limit so that as the law stands now we can not enlist beyond twenty-five thousand men in the Army.

Mr. BECK. I so understand it, and I desire to so retain it, and I object to the adding of five thousand more troops to the Army of the United States when the necessity for an army is less now than it ever has been since the foundation of the Government. If administrations that have had power since the war thought it was good policy to reduce the Army, it being conceded that at one time the law authorized thirty thousand men and was cut down to twenty-five thousand, and if the condition of the country has improved so that the Indian question can be more easily managed now than it was years ago, and when there is no question about reconstruction, no questions of strife about elections or race troubles, no question about soldiers being needed anywhere except to suppress possible Indian hostilities, I insist that it is bad policy for the present administration to add five thousand more soldiers to the Army of the United States than were needed by the administrations which have passed, especially when former administrations reduced the maximum from thirty thousand to twenty-five thousand men annually, because twenty-five thousand was all they needed. I object to adding so many more millions or whatever it will cost to the expenditures of this Government, thereby, as I said, depriving Congress of the power to reduce taxation where the people need relief and giving an excuse for adding to it that which is not needed, to wit, an increased Army. That method of expenditure does not meet my approval. That we need soldiers anywhere except to fight Indians I deny. That we have more officers in proportion than we have men I admit; that we have more officers than are needed I admit; but they will form a nucleus on which to base an army if any occasion ever arises, and through them we will be enabled to build up an army very rapidly.

I saw enough volunteer soldiers, it seems to me, on the 4th day of March a year ago, parading Pennsylvania avenue the day of the President's inauguration, from Pennsylvania, Virginia, and all over the country, to have carried on any probable Indian war successfully themselves. Perhaps, as I never saw very large bodies of men, I may have magnified their appearance; but the volunteer soldiers of the United States have always come to the front whenever they were called for and always will. If the great civil war was an unmitigated evil in all else, it developed to the world that this people, when united, can never be invaded by a foreign foe, and that we need no standing army either to gratify the pride of generals or to be used as a menace against our own people for any purpose. Whenever war arises the volunteer soldier comes to the front, the class of men we all saw on Pennsylvania avenue a year ago; and we shall find, whenever a call is made, that these men will maintain their rights and the rights of the American people better than any mercenary soldiers who can be hired anywhere. Therefore I protest now against this increase of the regular Army.

The Senator from Nebraska says there are more Indians in certain portions of the country than there are soldiers. Of course there are, and if we are going to have as many soldiers as we have Indians at all points in order to have a fair fight, we may as well increase the Army to one hundred thousand at once.

I tell the Senator from Nebraska if Indian wars ever threaten anywhere on that Western frontier, the people who live there, instead of being the harmless, inoffensive, dependent, defenseless people that he indicates they are, will be found to be men who, if they are called out upon any emergency, will defend those frontiers against any attack likely to be made upon them. The cowboys of Montana, Colorado, and Wyoming, and that country alone, if called into the service of the United States, would be more efficient, more prompt, and do better service than any soldiers you can hire and place in the regular Army. They are all subject to the command of the President as Commander-in-Chief of the Army of the United States, and they will respond in all the great Territories. They might not carry on war with as much mercy or as much care for the life of the Indian as some sentimental gentlemen might desire to see done; but offer $500 apiece for the scalp of every Indian who seeks to massacre white men, and the Indian tribes that attempt such outrages would be exterminated very soon, perhaps to the disgust of some of the gentlemen who think they ought to be taught Greek and Latin and ought, when captured on the war-path, be led back quietly to their reservation and fed abundantly until they can break out again after they have passed a comfortable winter. I do not believe in extermination, but I believe that the lives of our white settlers should be protected at all hazards, even if whole tribes of Indians should be extinguished in doing it.

You can not carry on war with sentimentality. Our small Army can be promptly increased. The men of this country can defend themselves and will defend themselves if a reasonable opportunity is given. So all the pretense that more soldiers are needed to put down Indian wars is not, in my opinion, worth considering, as the Government can command at once all the men it needs by promptly enlisting men who can ride as well, shoot as well, go as far as an Indian, and do all that is needed on the field of battle as well as any Indian that can be found in any tribe. Let such men be called in from the plains when emergencies arise to defend their neighbors and their friends and their own lives and property, and they will be efficient against any outbreak that may come. We must teach our people to rely on themselves and not to rely upon standing armies.

Mr. President, I believe that there are many men in this country who have no faith in the great mass of the people, men who would like to see a great standing army, who would like to use them against their own citizens if they dare to rise against the great monopolies and the privileges they so often unjustly obtain—men who think that citizen soldiers can not be relied upon, but insist that we must have a standing army to put every little disorder down. I hope that is not the object now. If so, keep the soldiers in our great cities, keep them as a standing menace, with our military commanders at their head, and let every citizen see that if he dares to complain anywhere, there is a standing army to put him down. If that is the object, let us say so. If the object is only to fight Indians, we have more now, with the other adjuncts subject to our call, than we need, more than we ever required before, so that there is no object in enlisting more men for Indian service.

I know it is very easy to say that a standing army is necessary to put down domestic trouble. That was the cry over the Continent of Europe for hundreds of years, yet every country that adopted the system and built up a standing army became a despotism as soon as the standing army was strong enough and obeyed the orders of its leader readily enough to crush down the liberties of the people. The mutiny act in England and the reliance of the people upon themselves, keeping down her great standing army, has alone preserved what of liberty she maintains. I admit that Napoleon's action at Paris broke up the mob, but it broke up what remained of republicanism and liberty as well. I admit that a standing army will act as a machine better than any volunteer corps in stopping disturbance; but the chieftain who leads it will find all the great moneyed powers and classes at his back asking him to become master of the situation in order to secure what they call their property and their rights. The measures adopted to stop trouble often end in a consolidated military power. I hope we are not preparing for that. I hope this Congress will not look in that direction, because where there are evils all around us, the country must maintain itself upon the idea that the people will come to arms and defend their rights and liberties whenever called upon, and with a united people the combined world will never attack us upon our own soil.

We may have and we will have strifes on the ocean. We ought to build up a navy, because on the highways of the world we are otherwise not safe; but on our own soil no man will assert that any foreign foe will ever dare, or ever think—not to use the word "dare"—of attacking us any more. If there are Indian troubles, the means that we have to concentrate our forces, the superior facilities we now have of reaching all the points of difficulty over anything we have had before make me believe that the addition of five thousand men at this time is absolutely unnecessary.

The other details of the bill I am not advised about; but against the section giving the right to add five thousand men to the Army I will protest and vote.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

Mr. LOGAN. I do not wish to interfere with the Senator, but there is one remark of the Senator from Kentucky that I should like to be permitted to reply to just now, if the Senator will let me.

Mr. TELLER. I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. LOGAN. I want to call the attention of the Senator from Kentucky to one thing. It is usual that bills in the Senate as well as many other places are defeated by a strange character of argument—I will not use the word demagogism, because that would not be proper here—but I will say an argument that is not exactly an argument calculated to convince the mind. The insinuation of the Senator from Kentucky that this proposition is made for some purpose hidden here—to use the Army against our own people—is unworthy of himself, for he knows that I have made this proposition for the past ten years at every Congress that I have been in where I have had the opportunity to do so.

Mr. BECK. The Senator will allow me a word. I never thought of the Senator from Illinois; I did not even know that he reported the bill. I know he is a very important member of the Military Committee, but I read the bill, and thought the Senator from Nebraska was more responsible for it than anybody else. If the Senator thinks I meant anything personal to him he is mistaken.

Mr. LOGAN. I am not speaking of any personal reference to me. I am speaking of that reference to the persons who desire this increase of the Army as well as myself. If this section is beaten because it is unworthy to be in this bill, that is all right; but I do not intend, as the author of this bill and the advocate of it on this floor or elsewhere, to have it understood that there is any purpose save the one expressed, or that there is any design in this proposition to increase the Army other than for the purpose of making it efficient.

I have no reason to desire the Army to be used against our own people, nor have I any such desire; but for the proper purposes of the Army I have contended for many years that our Army should be made efficient. The law provides that we shall have fifty men in a company unless the President for some reason that is good to him shall increase it to one hundred. I have insisted ever since the reduction of the Army that thirty thousand men was the proper proportion for the purpose of making a proper and efficient army. No change of front so far as I am concerned has been made. It has been my deliberate opinion for years and is my opinion now that our Army ought to be increased and improved.

I find that the men who have done the least in war are always more statesmanlike in time of peace when it comes to anything in reference to the Army. The men who at the time war occurred were of an age that they might have served their country but failed to do it, they become the great leaders, with all the knowledge and experience necessary in order to lead in the preparation of armies to be used against the enemies of the country.

My friend from Maine who is absent—and therefore I will not refer to him now—was doubtless encouraged by the opposition of other Senators to make war upon this bill at the start. I know not why. I think good fortune would perhaps have come to this bill more certainly had it been reported by some one else.

That is all I desire now to say. Before this matter closes I may have something more to urge.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator from Colorado to yield to me that I may make a report from the conference committee on the urgency deficiency bill.

Mr. TELLER. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. ALLISON. I submit the report of the conference committee.

The Secretary read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5893) "to provide for certain of the most urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 6 and 7, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of said amendment insert the following:

"To enable the Secretary of War to repair the submarine cable, Block Island Bay, $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary in the judgment of the Secretary of War."

And the Senate agree to the same.

W. B. ALLISON,
EUGENE HALE,
F. M. COCKRELL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

JAMES N. BURNES,
LOUIS E. McCOMAS,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

EFFICIENCY OF THE ARMY.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Will the Senator from Colorado yield to me for a moment to ask to put on its passage Senate bill 1319?

Mr. TELLER. It only lacks now about five minutes until the expiration of the morning hour, and if I can go on to-morrow morning when this Army bill comes up I will yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. LOGAN. There will be no objection to that as far as I am concerned.

Mr. TELLER. I will yield then with that understanding.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Colorado or the Senator from Illinois ask for an order to that effect?

Mr. LOGAN. I ask that this Army bill be the regular order for to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois asks that Senate bill No. 777 be made the regular order for to-morrow morning after the routine morning business is concluded. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. PLATT. I ask permission of the Senate to put in the RECORD a statement of where the Army is now located. Several Senators desire to use it in the debate to-morrow morning, and I ask that it may be incorporated in the RECORD in this connection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRYE in the chair). The Senator from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the papers which he has sent to the desk. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The paper referred to is as follows:

ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, March 22, 1886.

CONFIRMATION OF LAND ENTRIES.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I interrupted the Senator from Colorado, who was recognized on the bill to increase the efficiency of the Army, and he yielded that I might call up the bill to which I have referred, because he was aware of the provisions of the bill and the necessity of its immediate passage. There will be no objection to it probably. The number of the bill is 1319.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1319) to confirm entries of lands heretofore made under the land laws of the United States.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with amendments, in line 3, after the word "entry," to insert "of public lands subject to entry;" in line 7, after the word "made," to strike out "is hereby confirmed to the extent and shall be perfected and proceed to patent the same" and insert "shall be adjudged in the same manner;" and in line 13, after the word "made," to strike out "they" and insert "such charges;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, &c., That any entry in public lands subject to entry heretofore made under the land laws of the United States, in conformity with the rules, regulations, and decisions of the General Land Office and the Interior Department at the time such entry was made, shall be adjudged in the same manner as if said rules, regulations, and decisions had not been reversed or modified: Provided, That such entry must have been made in good faith, and no charges of fraud have been made against the same; and in case any charges of fraud have been made, such charges shall be investigated in the same manner and with the same effect as if the rules, regulations, and decisions under which the entry was made had not been modified or reversed.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to inquire whether this refers to homestead entries only?

Mr. VAN WYCK. This refers to homestead entries and timber-culture entries, and any entries of lands of the United States subject to entry. It is that an entry, which when made was legal shall be held——

Mr. CONGER. I do not care about that part of it. Does it include all entries made under all species of scrip?

Mr. VAN WYCK. Oh, no!

Mr. CONGER. Because if it does confirm and guarantee to those who have used Valentine scrip and other kinds of scrip it ought to have further consideration.

Mr. PLATT. Let us have the bill read as amended. It is short.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read as amended.

The Secretary read the bill as amended.

Mr. ALLISON. This, it seems to me, is an important bill. It affects a great many people, and I should be very glad if the Senator from Nebraska would explain briefly the reasons why the rules and regulations have been modified, and why it is necessary to legislate against the modifications made in the rules and regulations of the Land Office.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I would say to my friend that the changes of administration (of which no one is more aware than himself) generally include changes of the officers, the agencies through which the laws are regulated and administered. Under previous administrations certain rules and regulations had grown up and had been controlling the entries of public lands of the United States. They had become as familiar as the laws themselves, and necessarily were virtually a part of the laws themselves. Whether those regulations were all right it is not for the committee to say, nor for the Senate at this time. Suffice it to say that there were modifications of these rules. If I had time this morning I should be very happy to explain the extent of those changes. At all events they were made, and those changes necessarily affected the entry of lands heretofore made. For instance, in the case of timber-culture entries, the law permitted an entry of a quarter-section on land devoid of timber. That law received its construction under the administration existing at the time, and by and by it was extended. There came a question as to what "devoid of timber" meant. That resulted in instructions that where along a stream, for instance, there might be a little timber grown up, that section was devoid of timber, and therefore a timber-culture entry could be made on it if there were only four or five or half a dozen straggling acres of timber. At one time the ruling was that if there was not natural timber on the section to suffice the wants of those who might occupy it, it was then devoid of timber. Consequently the settler goes on and makes his timber-culture entry and obtains instructions from the officer, who at the time is the Government, who is the law, and he says to the settler, "You may enter your quarter-section, because the Department holds that this land is devoid of timber."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, on which the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Mr. President, will the Senator allow us a few minutes to dispose of this bill?

Mr. JACKSON. I yield for a few moments.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Will the Senator consent that we dispose of this matter, or would he prefer that it go over?

Mr. JACKSON. How long will it occupy?

Mr. VAN WYCK. Not long. I think there is no objection to the bill. I was merely explaining the necessity of its provisions. I will only ask a few moments longer.

On the change of administration the present Commissioner of the General Land Office, examining this statute, thought it was more logical probably—and in that I do not say that he would not be right if it was an original question—to say that land devoid of timber meant denuded of timber; and therefore if there was any timber on a section, however small the quantity, it was not within the provision of the law, and could not be considered as devoid of timber. It is not intended by this bill or by this Congress to say which construction was correct. What is proposed is only that a person who, two years ago, may have entered a timber-culture claim and not have perfected his title shall not be antagonized by the ruling of the present administration, which would be unjust to him. That injustice appears manifest, because a very worthy man in the State of Nebraska had made his timber-culture entry under the rules of the Department as they existed at the time he made it, two years ago, and now that the time has come when he seeks to perfect his title he is met by the statement that the rules of the Department have been changed, and therefore an entry that was good and legal when made, by the subsequent ruling is now invalidated, because there are a few straggling trees upon this quarter-section of land.

Mr. LOGAN. I understand this is to validate such entries.

Mr. VAN WYCK. It is to confirm these entries, the same as if the rules and regulations had not been changed.

Mr. LOGAN. I will put a case to the Senator and see whether the bill covers it or not. For instance, some years ago some gentlemen, I do not know who, laid scrip—I do not remember whether Valentine scrip or not—on a part of the front of Chicago city, which was held to be public land by the then Commissioner, though worth millions of dollars. After that the rule was changed so as to prevent that scrip from taking hold of that land. What effect would this bill have on that entry?

Mr. VAN WYCK. This bill is intended to cover pre-emption, homestead, and timber-culture entries under the general land laws of the United States; but I would say to the Senator that his suggestion is very proper, as also the suggestion of the Senator from Michigan. The bill can very easily be modified so that it can not be construed to cover those cases, because it is not the intention of the committee to reach such cases.

Mr. LOGAN. I did not suppose it was. I was only asking about the effect of the bill.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I am very glad the Senator has made the suggestion. A citizen who has entered his timber-culture land when he finds himself in this position of course then says, "What am I to do? To enter a timber-culture claim now I must go 50 miles farther west, and then when I get ready to take a patent for that claim the chances are that the Supreme Court"—and it seems the people have a very clear conception of the practices of the Supreme Court—"will have decided that I was right at first." He may say, "The chances are that when I get ready to take my patent 50 miles farther west, it will have been decided that I should have adhered to my original timber-culture claim, and thereby I should lose both."

That is one class of cases. The others arise by reason of the question whether a homestead claimant can commute his homestead into a preemption. There has been a change of ruling on that point. I merely mention that to illustrate. This bill is for the protection of all that great class of citizens. They probably would be protected by the officers in charge; but it will be a greater certainty, a greater guarantee to the individuals interested in these cases, to know that they are in any event protected in any contingency in receiving title to their lands under the law the same as they would have been entitled had the rules and regulations not been changed and modified.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I understand the new rules and regulations of which the Senator speaks had the effect to limit and to impede the settlers in their efforts to secure titles to their lands, and it is to cure those defects that this bill is proposed.

Mr. VAN WYCK. That is the intention of the bill.

Mr. LOGAN. Now I desire to make this suggestion to the Senator from Nebraska, that he insert in the bill the words "homestead and timber-culture entries," so as to make it certain that it will not apply to any other class.

Mr. PLUMB. I would suggest a better way than that. While I do not think the bill is open to the objection, I would suggest at the close the addition of a proviso that it shall not apply to entries by scrip of any kind.

Mr. LOGAN. That will do.

Mr. TELLER. The case referred to by the Senator from Illinois the bill could not possibly apply to.

Mr. LOGAN. I did not know whether it could or not. I only asked the question.

Mr. TELLER. Still it is well enough to put in a guard.

Mr. LOGAN. Referring to the old rules might not contemplate anything of that kind; therefore I thought it better to have it provided for.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I move to add to the bill:

Provided, That this act shall not apply to scrip entries of public lands.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DUTIES OF TREASURER OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. MORRILL submitted the following report:

R. 5544) to amend section 304 of the Revised Statutes of the United States having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 7, and 9, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 6, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In line 13 of said bill, after the word "of," strike out the word "the" and insert the words "every such;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 8, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Insert in lieu of the matter stricken out the words "from time to time;" and the Senate agree to the same.

RELATIONS BETWEEN THE SENATE AND EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolutions reported by Mr. EDMUNDS from the Committee on the Judiciary February 18, expressing the sense of the Senate on the refusal of the Attorney-General to send copies of certain papers.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, when my remarks were interrupted yesterday by the executive session I was showing to the Senate that the demand for these papers rested upon no solid reason, because the ground that the Senate was first called upon to give its assent to Duskin's removal from office before considering the nomination of John D. Burnett for the same was utterly unfounded. I had shown that under the commission of Duskin the provisions of the tenure-of-office law had no application whatever to this case, as there was a vacancy.

Now, Mr. President, it will be admitted on all hands that whenever vacancies in office occur they should and ought to be filled promptly; that there is no power in this Government to fill those vacancies except through a nomination by the executive department and the action of the Senate thereon. Now, what is to be the result of a failure to act on this nomination? What is to follow at the close of this session of the Senate if the Senate carries out the third of these resolutions and fails to act on the nomination? A vacancy will occur during the session of the Senate. If that vacancy continues to the end of the session of the Senate, can it be filled by the President as a vacancy in recess? That is one of the questions about which there is great doubt between constitutional lawyers and writers and the decisions of the courts.

I am aware that it has been the opinion of the Attorneys-General of the United States since 1823, when the question was first decided by Mr. Wirt as Attorney-General, that the President during the recess of the Senate had the right to fill a vacancy that had occurred during the session of the Senate. That opinion was followed afterward by Mr. Taney when he was Attorney-General, by Mr. Legaré, by Mr. Mason, by Mr. Cushing, by Mr. Stanbery, by Mr. Bates, by Mr. Devens, and by our distinguished associate the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS]. Mr. Attorney-General Evarts gave the last opinion on the subject in the case of Gilpin. Afterward Gilpin's case went into the courts and was decided by Judge Cadwalader, of Philadelphia, one of the most eminent and distinguished of the Federal judges of this country. Judge Cadwalader reached the conclusion that on a vacancy occurring during the session of the Senate there was no power in the President to fill that vacancy in the recess of the Senate even with a temporary appointment.

That is the only judicial decision on the question that I have been able to find. The practice of the Government has, to some extent, been different under the opinions of the Attorneys-General, but the Senate has never conceded the proposition that a vacancy that had occurred during the session of the Senate could be filled in the recess. In 1813, during Mr. Madison's administration, the Senate considered the question and its committee made a report that it could not be filled by a temporary appointment. Judge Cadwalader goes fully in to that question in the Gilpin case, which Mr. Evarts had decided in August, 1868, that on a vacancy occurring during the session of the Senate the President could in vacation make a temporary appointment. I only read one of the authorities, and I do it on this branch of the subject simply to show the difficulties that are likely to arise in case the Senate pursues its determination not to act on such nominations.

Mr. Pomeroy, in discussing that very question, says:

The power to fill vacancies during the recess, by appointments which shall last to the close of the next session, extends by the express terms of the Constitution only to those which happen during a recess. All which happened during a session must be filled during the session, or they can not be filled at all and the nomination must be filled by the Senate. If language can express any thought, it is clear that a vacancy must not have commenced during a session and have extended into the recess. There is, therefore, a plain check upon removals by the President during a session, for he can not fill vacancies thus created, without consulting the Senate.

By the determination of the Senate in this case and in similar cases we are saying that we will have a vacancy which the President can not fill in the recess, or at least forcing a case which is doubtful, which is controverted, and which in the only decision that I can find on the question is decided against the right of the Executive to make such an appointment during recess. Judge Cadwalader in that very Gilpin case decides as follows:

The term for which the incumbent of an office, whose duration was limited by law, had been appointed by the President with the concurrence of the Senate, expired when the Senate was in session. No appointment in which the Senate concurred was made at that session and the President, in the ensuing recess, appointed another person to the office by a commission to expire at the end of the next session of the Senate. It seems that the former incumbent's term was not extended by the tenure-of-office act of 2d March, 1867, and that the subsequent appointment could not constitutionally take effect, the vacancy not having happened during a recess of the Senate.

That is, I say, a doubtful question on the practice of the Government, on the language of the Constitution, on the opinions of the Attorneys-General, and on these decisions, and yet that is to be forced upon us because papers that are not material, that are wholly irrelevant to the case before us and wholly irrelevant for any purpose here, are not supplied.

Mr. President, is this in the line of that calm and orderly administration of constitutional government for which the Senator from Vermont stood here and plead with so much earnestness the other day? Is it in the line of a calm and orderly administration of government to allow vacancies in office to remain unfilled and to let the session close and have these troublesome questions raised and to be raised in the recess of the Senate? No, sir; we were brought into this controversy, the whole question is brought here simply for political purposes and to make the occasion for an attack on the administration and to obstruct it in the exercise of its constitutional function.

But let us pass on and suppose that this Duskin case did come within the tenure-of-office act at the commencement of this controversy on the 26th of December, 1885, when the Committee on the Judiciary first requested the papers and information relating to his suspension. Suppose that it was still within the provision of that law on the 25th of January, 1886, when the Senate made its demand upon the Attorney-General for all papers and documents filed in the Department of Justice between the 1st of January, 1885, and the 25th of January, 1886, in relation to the mangement and conduct of the office of the United States district attorney for the southern district of Alabama, or that his original term had extended beyond the present session of the Senate, is it then true, as asserted by Senators on the other side of the Chamber who have spoken on this subject, that he would be restored to the office at the end of this session? If such is the case, how is that result to be accomplished except by the neglect and refusal of the Senate to act upon or by its arbitrary rejection of the nomination sent here by the President?

Is the Senate prepared to avow that it should or will neglect or disregard its duty under the law, of acting upon nominations which the Executive is authorized to make in order to effect such a restoration to office, and thus force upon an unwilling Executive an officer whose services are not desired or deemed conducive to the public interest? That is the proposition we have before us. The proposition that the suspended officer will be reinstated at the close of the session is a mere implication from a doubtful if not unwarranted construction of the statute.

To clearly understand the present law it should and must be considered in connection with the repealed sections 1 and 2 of the original act of March 2, 1867. I read sections 1 and 2 of the tenure-of-office act of 1867, which were repealed in 1869:

Be it enacted, &c., That every person holding any civil office to which he has been appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and every person who shall hereafter be appointed to any such office, and shall become duly qualified to act therein, is, and shall be, entitled to hold such office until a successor shall have been in like manner appointed and duly qualified, except as herein otherwise provided: Provided, That the Secretaries of State, of the Treasury, of War, of the Navy, and of the Interior, the Postmaster-General, and the Attorney-General shall hold their offices respectively for and during the term of the President by whom they may have been appointed and for one month thereafter, subject to removal by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That when any officer appointed as aforesaid, excepting judges of the United States courts, shall, during a recess of the Senate, be shown, by evidence satisfactory to the President, to be guilty of misconduct in office, or crime, or for any reason shall become incapable or legally disqualified to perform its duties, in such case, and in no other, the President may suspend such officer and designate some suitable person to perform temporarily the duties of such office until the next meeting of the Senate, and until the case shall be acted upon by the Senate, and such person so designated shall take the oaths and give the bonds required by law to be taken and given by the person duly appointed to fill such office; and in such case it shall be the duty of the President, within twenty days after the first day of such next meeting of the Senate, to report to the Senate such suspension, with the evidence and reasons for his action in the case, and the name of the person so designated to perform the duties of such office. And if the Senate shall concur in such suspension and advise and consent to the removal of such officer, they shall so certify to the President, who may thereupon remove such officer, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint another person to such office. But if the Senate shall refuse to concur in such suspension, such officer so suspended shall forthwith resume the functions of his office, and the powers of the person so performing its duties in his stead shall cease, and the official salary and emoluments of such officer shall, during such suspension, belong to the person so performing the duties thereof, and not to the officer so suspended: Provided, however, That the President, in case he shall become satisfied that such suspension was made on insufficient grounds, shall be authorized, at any time before reporting such suspension to the Senate as above provided, to revoke such suspension and reinstate such officer in the performance of the duties of his office.

* * * * * * *

By an examination of the first section it will be noticed that it embraces every civil officer appointed by and with the consent of the Senate except the heads of the Departments; that all such officers are only removable at the pleasure or will of the Senate; that they are given an indefinite tenure of office dependent upon Senatorial consent to their removal. It extends to all, whether they have a statutory term or not.

Mr. GEORGE. That is the act of 1867?

Mr. JACKSON. That is the act of 1867 on which I am making a running comment for the moment.

The second section provides that the President can only suspend for incapacity, crime, misconduct in office, and so on, temporarily until he can make his report to the Senate and get the Senate's consent to the suspension and removal of that officer. He reports his act, and the Senate act upon the suspension in that case. They report to the President their consent to his suspension and to the removal of the officer whom he has suspended. The Senate acted under that law upon the suspension and upon the removal, and the President was not authorized to remove until the Senate gave its consent. If the Senate failed to concur in the suspension or refused to give its consent to the removal of the officer under that section of the original act, he was immediately reinstated to the office.

I now read the amended sections 1 and 2 under the act of the 5th of April, 1869. Those sections are as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the first and second sections of an act entitled "An act regulating the tenure of certain civil offices," passed March 2, 1867, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and in lieu of said repealed sections the following are hereby enacted:

That every person holding any civil office to which he has been or hereafter may be appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who shall have become duly qualified to act therein, shall be entitled to hold such office during the term for which he shall have been appointed, unless sooner removed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, or by the appointment, with the like advice and consent, of a successor in his place, except as herein otherwise provided.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That during any recess of the Senate the President is hereby empowered, in his discretion, to suspend any civil officer appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, except judges of the United States courts, until the end of the next session of the Senate, and to designate some suitable person, subject to be removed in his discretion by the designation of another, to perform the duties of such suspended officer in the mean time; and such person so designated shall take the oaths and give the bonds required by law to be taken and given by the suspended officer, and shall, during the time he performs his duties, be entitled to the salary and emoluments of such office, no part of which shall belong to the officer suspended; and it shall be the duty of the President within thirty days after the commencement of each session of the Senate, except for any office which in his opinion ought not to be filled, to nominate persons to fill all vacancies in office which existed at the meeting of the Senate, whether temporarily filled or not, and also in the place of all officers suspended; and if the Senate during such session shall refuse to advise and consent to an appointment in the place of any suspended officer, then, and not otherwise, the President shall nominate another person as soon as practicable to said session of the Senate for said office.

What changes were made? The first section of the act of 1869, now carried into the Revised Statutes as section 1767, is limited and confined to officers holding by a definite tenure of office—by a statutory term its language being, "Who shall have become duly qualified to act therein, shall be entitled to hold such office during the term for which he shall have been appointed, unless sooner removed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, or by the appointment, with the like advice and consent, of a successor in his place, except as herein otherwise provided."

Then the second section gives to the President a full discretionary power of suspension and the right to make a temporary appointment, but within thirty days after the commencement of the next session he is to make his nomination for that office, and if that is not acted upon or rejected then the law provides in express terms that he shall make another and another nomination for the office.

How was this act intended and understood and construed at the time of its passage in amending the act repealing the original act of 1867? It is made the legal duty of the President not only to nominate under the amended act of April 5, 1869, but it is made the legal duty and obligation of the Senate to act upon that nomination. The Senate by an amendment to the repealing act of 1869 insisted upon incorporating this provision:

That if the Senate shall refuse by vote to assent to his suspension, then, and not otherwise, such officer at the end of the session shall be entitled to resume the possession of the office from which he was suspended, and afterward to discharge its duties and receive the emoluments as though no such suspension had taken place.

This would have given to the suspended officer, in case of non-action upon the nomination sent to the Senate, the right to be returned or reinstated in his office at the close of the session, but it was stricken out by the conference committee of the two Houses, and they reported the section with this in lieu:

Then, and not otherwise, the President shall nominate another person as soon as practicable to said session of the Senate for said office.

Thus leaving the statute as it is now found in sections 1767 and 1768, Revised Statutes.

The very provision that the Senators on the other side insist upon, the right to have a suspended officer reinstated at the end of the session, was attempted to be secured by the Senate and was stricken out by the conference committees of the two Houses. Yet we are now to infer, we are now to imply, we are now to make a construction of the statute which by implication will give a right which was expressly denied and stricken out in the passage of the act. How can we make an implication in the face of such a provision as that stricken out when it was sought to be incorporated and made a part of the act itself? I know of no rule of construction by which that can be done.

In this connection I desire to call attention to various statements by the distinguished lawyers of the House of Representatives in 1869, explaining how they understood the act and what was the intention in passing it. I shall read a few extracts from the statements of Mr. Bingham, Mr. Butler, Mr. Banks, Mr. Poland, and our distinguished colleague, Senator LOGAN, of Illinois. They all construe the act as making the suspension an actual removal or as equivalent to it:

Mr. DAVIS. Does the first section of the Senate amendment remain untouched, according to the report of the committee of conference?

Mr. BINGHAM. It does. But the first and second sections of the tenure-of-office law are wholly repealed, and there is inserted in lieu of those sections the first section of the amendment of the Senate and the second section as amended by the conference committee. In other words, the limitations upon the power of the Executive imposed by the first and second sections of the original tenure-of-office act are wholly repealed.

Mr. DAVIS. And the whole principle involved in the act, which is whether or not the Senate has the power of removal, is left untouched?

Mr. BINGHAM. I claim that the word "removal" and the word "suspension," as used in the amendment of the Senate, are synonyms.

* * * * * * *

Mr. DAVIS. That is the opinion of the gentleman as a lawyer of the effect of this section as proposed to be amended by the report of the committee of conference?

Mr. BINGHAM. That is precisely my opinion. The effect of striking out the restoring clause of the Senate amendment is to leave with the President, under the limitations of law, all the power that was ever claimed for the President under the Constitution of the United States, to wit: To take away from an officer appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate the power to control the office corruptly against the interests of the United States. But this power of the President is put in the form of an act of suspension; and having made the suspension the President must report that fact, together with the nomination of a person to exercise the duties of the suspended officer, to the Senate within thirty days after the commencement of its next session. If the Senate agree to the appointment, then the old officer is gone and there is the end of him. If the Senate shall not agree to the appointment, then the President is required, as soon as practicable, to nominate to the same session of the Senate another person to fill the office. If the Senate shall agree to the new nomination of the President, then the office becomes filled; if the Senate shall not agree, but shall adjourn without such agreement, the office will be vacant.

* * * * * * *

* * * And now, Mr. Speaker, as to the suggested obscurity of the measure. There will be no difficulty in the world when the record is made up in understanding precisely the extent to which the tenure-of-office act of March 2, 1867, has been repealed and amended. The general principle, however, of legislative power over the mode and manner of suspending civil officers in this Government is still retained upon the statute-book, where I suppose it will remain. I now return the floor to the chairman of the committee of conference, thanking him for his courtesy.

* * * * * * *

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. * * * Now, the amendment agreed to by the committee of conference strikes out all that gives the Senate power to reinstate a suspended officer, but provides that where the Senate refuse to concur in the nomination of a person in the place of the suspended officer, then the President shall send in another nomination. This leaves the effect of the constitutional provision and of the other section of the act just this: That if the President does not send in a satisfactory nomination, then the place remains vacant at the end of the session, precisely as it is now under the Constitution, independent of the tenure-of-office law, with the power in the President to again suspend the objectionable officer, if the construction is not as it is claimed, that the office then is in abeyance, or vacant, which is the same thing.

In other words, as I understand this, it is practically only the substitution of a power of suspension instead of a power of removal with all the effect of a power of removal, supposing the tenure-of-office law was not in existence. I should have preferred to have arrived at the like result which this amendment does by the shorter way of repealing the tenure-of-office law, and I am free to say that I think this amendment upon the question of removal and reinstatement of officers leaves the tenure-of-office act as though it never had been passed so far as the power of the President over the executive officers is concerned.

The first section of the amendment to which my attention is called by my colleague [Mr. Banks] of course leaves the power over removal in terms as it stands in the tenure bill. But the second section substitutes the power of suspension. The contest between the Senate and the House in that matter is upon the difference between the power of suspension and the power of removal, suspension having in effect all the incidents that removal has. That is all the difference. In its practical workings it is a difference in name in my judgment, and upon a difference in name I think the two Houses ought not to divide in a matter of this importance. That is to say, the first section says an officer shall not be removed without the advice and consent of the Senate; but the second section says he may be suspended and another man put in his place, and in case the other man is satisfactory to the Senate, then the officer is removed and the substitute becomes the officer; but in case the substitute is not satisfactory to the Senate, then the place becomes vacant and the officer is removed in that way.

* * * * * * *

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. He is suspended until the end of the next session of the Senate, and in case the office is not filled then, the third section of the tenure-of-office law comes in and says that the office in the cases enumerated shall remain in abeyance and that the chief deputy officer shall perform the duties of the office. The amendment must be read in connection with the law in order to understand it rightly. In legal language the amendment admits the power of the Senate over removals. It substitutes suspension for removal, but the practical effect of suspension is the same as removal.

* * * * * * *

Mr. BANKS. I want to state what I understand to be the effect of this report of the committee of conference, in order that I may be corrected if I am wrong. By the first section, if the President makes a removal of an officer, calling it a removal, and the Senate refuse to confirm the nomination for his successor, then the officer who has been removed is restored. But if the President removes an officer, calling it a suspension, and the Senate refuse to confirm the nomination made in place of the suspended officer, then the suspended officer is not restored, but it is made the duty of the President to make another nomination as soon as practicable, and the suspended officer is at no time restored.

* * * * * * *

Mr. BINGHAM. * * * Mr. Speaker, the gentleman understands very well that the words "at discretion" incorporated in the law of the country conclude courts and conclude every other department of the Government. It was so settled fifty years ago, I believe, in a case arising in the gentleman's own State, under the act of 1793, where the Executive had power at his direction to call out the militia. It was there held that his exercise of that power under the statute of the United States concluded the courts, although it took the citizen away from his home, placed him under arms, and exposed him to the dangers and trials of battle, and denied him the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus; that there was no tribunal on earth that could challenge his action under the law which authorized him to exercise the power "at his discretion."

* * * * * * *

Mr. POLAND. * * * I understand that the difference between the report of the committee of conference and what is claimed on the part of my Democratic friends is merely this: they say the Constitution gives to the President absolute and unlimited power of removal which Congress or the Senate have no check upon whatever. The report of the committee of conference purports to be a grant of power from Congress to the President of precisely the same thing. Inasmuch as we attempt to give this power to the President, by a kind of implication, it would appear that it was ours to give. So by this report of the committee of conference we surrender everything of principle contained in the tenure-of-office law; and it purports to be a surrender. Therefore I desire every Republican who wishes to maintain the principle of the tenure-of-office law and that there should be a check upon the power of removal, a power reserved in the Senate to say to the President, "You shall not without any cause turn out this man," to vote against the report made by this committee.

* * * * * * *

Mr. LOGAN. * * * Now, sir, the conference committee, whether because that point was made or not makes no difference to me, have stricken from the bill that which was obnoxious. It relieves the bill of that portion which clearly to my mind was unconstitutional. What have they left? They have left the shadow of the substance and nothing more. Although I should prefer a bill of two lines: "Be it enacted, &c., That the civil tenure-of-office law, approved at such a date, is hereby repealed," although I would have approved that, yet, inasmuch as the Senate have some pride of opinion, and the House have some pride of opinion, and the Republican portion of the House are divided in reference to this question, and the Senate and House had chosen a committee of members representing both sides of that question, I am willing to vote for the report which they have made. In their agreement they have done, in my judgment, what I would have done, except they have employed different language from that which I would have employed. I would have said "repealed," but they have said in a great many words what amounts to the same thing.

With the permission of the gentleman from Massachusetts, I will add one other word. The first and second sections of the tenure-of-office law are repealed. The third section stands with an amendment to it. The third section following this provision reported by the committee provides that the President may suspend from office, and if the Senate confirm the nomination of the President, the office is filled; if not, the office becomes vacant.

I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that President Grant in enforcing the act in its amended form indiscriminately sent messages here of suspension and removal, making no distinction between them. At least one-third, I believe, of the nominations that President Grant made were on removals, using the terms "removal" and "suspension" as synonymous. Sometimes he would send in a nomination for a position, "vice Marshall B. Blake," for instance, "to be removed." Then the nomination sent to the Senate would be in place of So-and-so, "removed." I append two such messages under date of January, 1870:

To the Senate of the United States:

I nominate Munson H. Treadwell to be collector of internal revenue, seventh district of New York, vice Marshall B. Blake, to be removed.

U. S. GRANT.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 12, 1870.

To the Senate of the United States:

I nominate William Forbes to be deputy postmaster at Macon City, in the County of Macon and State of Missouri, in place of D. C. McKay, removed.

U. S. GRANT.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 17, 1870.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator a question, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRYE in the chair). Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. JACKSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to ask him whether any of those messages that say "removed" were in respect of persons of whom the President took action in vacation or during a session of the Senate?

Mr. JACKSON. I infer from the dates that they were during the session of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes; and may I add a word to my friend, with his permission?

Mr. JACKSON. However, I should have to look in order to see whether the Senate was in session; from the date I would infer that the Senate was in session.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think that is probable. Will my friend allow me to add a word?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield?

Mr. JACKSON. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to call to his attention, because I know his perfect candor, and fairness, and desire to do right, the circumstance that during the time of Mr. Hayes, President of the United States, similar messages came to the Senate, and the Senate adopted a resolution calling on the President of the United States to inform the Senate whether that form of nomination implied that the President had undertaken to remove the officer, or what, and the reply of President Hayes was (and it is in the Journals of the Senate; I can give a reference of it to my friend) that it was an old form used, but it did not imply anything of that kind; that it only meant that the person was removed if the Senate consented to the removal. That is historical, and I thought it right to call the attention of the Senator to it.

Mr. JACKSON. I am obliged to the Senator from Vermont. I was not familiar with that fact. I only called attention to these cases from General Grant which followed almost immediately after the passage of the law to show how the administration then construed it. It may be regarded as a contemporaneous construction by the administration, the Senate assenting to it and acting upon the nominations then without question, he treating suspension and removal as the same thing.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Oh, no.

Mr. JACKSON. Well, by the form of the nominations, or on the face of the nominations the fact appears. All I can judge by is the face of the nominations, and fully a third are made in that form.

But, Mr. President, what becomes of another class of cases? The first section of the amended act of 1869 clearly covers, and covers only, the cases of offices having definite terms. It does not cover the case of on officer having no tenure of office. What becomes of a suspended officer such as a collector of internal revenue? Is he, without a definite term and not provided for by the law, to be treated as restored at the end of the session? If so, for what time, and for what term? There is nothing in the law to warrant the implication that such an officer would go back.

But, Mr. President, looking at the second section of the amended act, or as carried into the Revised Statutes at section 1768, by the express provisions of this statute it is made the duty of the Senate to act upon the President's nominations submitted under and in pursuance of the law, and either advise and consent to their appointment or refuse it. No suggestion or intimation is made in the law now in force that the Senate is first to consider and determine the question as to whether it will give its assent to the removal of a suspended officer. That was expressly provided for by section 2 of the original act; but that provision being directly repealed by the act of 1869, no such duty can now devolve upon the Senate by construction or implication. Still Senators on the other side attempt to so interpret the law as to make it the duty of the Senate to assent or dissent to such removal before obeying the positive and affirmative duty of acting upon the nomination as plainly and distinctly directed by the statute.

An express requirement to consider and act upon the nomination is thus subordinated and made secondary to the implied right of passing upon the question of removal. On an implication more or less doubtful, if not wholly unwarranted, that the suspended officer may be restored to the office at the close of the session if his term has not then expired, upon the contingency of the Senate's failure or neglect to consent to any appointment during the session, there is deduced the right on the part of the Senate of first determining whether it will assent to the removal at all, and on such implication it proposes to justify itself in making the very contingency for that restoration by neglecting to perform the affirmative and positive duty imposed upon it by the law of considering and acting upon the nominations made by the President under the express direction of the statute.

Thus the implied right of assenting or dissenting to the removal, if it in fact exists, is raised above the positive requirement of the law to consider and act upon the nomination in order that the event may happen on which the suspended officer may be again forced upon the administration. If the suspended officer is ever restored to office it can only be done by the refusal of the Senate to obey the law by acting upon the President's nomination, which he is authorized to make and to continue to make until one satisfactory to the Senate is presented.

But I shall not detain the Senate longer on this question, which has been so fully considered and covered. I see nothing in this but an attempt to encroach upon the functions and rights of the Executive or to obstruct him in an administration which he is attempting to make in the line of reform. No President for the past half century of our Government has ever acted with more moderation, none has acted with a more conscientious regard for the public interest, and yet at the very outset of his administration he is obstructed in this way, and on grounds that are wholly unwarranted. He may well appeal from the Senate to the country, for the country will sustain him in his action.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is on an amendment to the resolution. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Several SENATORS. "Vote." "Vote."

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL], who I see is not in his seat, informed me that he desired to address the Senate at the close of the remarks made by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON]. I presume, as he is not in his seat, that it is my duty to go on now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. GEORGE Mr. President, the American Senate is to-day, as it has been for some weeks, engaged in the consideration of questions of great moment to the American people; involving, as I believe, a claim on our part to a supremacy and even mastery over a co-ordinate and independent department of the Government, so ordained and established by the Constitution itself. We, the Senate of the United States, the most aristocratic and least responsible to the people of all in the legislative and executive departments, holding our offices for a longer term and receiving them not directly from the people, but at second-hand through representatives and agents who, in too many instances, are found in numbers small indeed as compared to the whole, but sufficiently large to control elections, utterly oblivious to the people's will.

The great men who framed the Constitution and the people of the several States who ratified it provided for three separate, independent, and co-ordinate departments of the Government, to each of which were delegated separate and distinct powers, to be exercised by it for the common good, according to its own judgment and on its own responsibility, as fixed in the Constitution. No part of the scheme of the Constitution was deemed more important or more essential than this separation of powers in equal and independent departments and the preservation of this equality and independence in each from encroachments and usurpation by the others. Though this is a maxim in American politics and needs no elaboration or defense, I hope I may be pardoned for reading, in illustration of it, a short extract from a great authority—the Supreme Court of the United States. I read from the opinion of the court in Kilbourn vs. Thompson (103 United States Reports, page 190, 191):

> It is believed to be one of the chief merits of the American system of written constitutional law, that all the powers intrusted to the Government, whether State or National, are divided into the three grand departments, the executive, the legislative, and the judicial. That the functions appropriate to each of these branches of Government shall be vested in a separate body of public servants, and that the perfection of the system requires that the lines which separate and divide these departments shall be broadly and clearly defined. It is also essential to the successful working of this system that the persons intrusted with power in any one of these branches shall not be permitted to encroach upon the powers confided to the others, but that each shall by the law of its creation be limited to the exercise of the powers appropriate to its own department and no other. To these general propositions there are in the Constitution of the United States some important exceptions. One of these is, that the President is so far made a part of the legislative power that his assent is required to the enactment of all statutes and resolutions of Congress.
> In the main, however, that instrument, the model on which are constructed the fundamental laws of the States, has blocked out with singular precision, and in bold lines, in its three primary articles, the allotment of power to the executive, the legislative, and the judicial departments of the Government. It also remains true, as a general rule, that the powers confided by the Constitution to one of these departments can not be exercised by another.

It is true, Mr. President, that the framers of the Constitution provided, in several instances, for an intermingling of these powers, as the veto of the President to acts of legislation, the trying of impeachments by the Senate, and the requiring of the advice and consent of the Senate as a restriction on the power of the President to make appointments to office and to conclude treaties with foreign powers. But in these exceptional instances of intermingling of powers the jurisdiction of the body or officer receiving the alien power was carefully defined and limited. No general right to exercise the power was granted, but in every instance the manner of its exercise and the circumstances under which it was to be exercised and the effect of its exercise were carefully limited and defined.

Thus the veto power of the President must be exercised within ten days after the bill has reached him. It must also be accompanied by the reasons of the President in writing, and these must be communicated to the House in which the bill originated. A neglect to reduce the objections to writing, or, when written, a failure to send them to the proper House within the time limited, would make the attempted veto void. So, in case of the trial of impeachments by the Senate, it is prescribed that the Senators should be under oath or affirmation; that the concurrence of two-thirds of the Senators present shall be necessary to a conviction, and that the punishment shall not extend beyond removal from office and disqualification to hold office. A trial and conviction without the observance of these provisions would be void, and a judgment beyond that prescribed in the Constitution is a nullity. So, in the sixth clause of section 1, Article II, where an extraordinary power is conferred on Congress to provide for a vacancy or interregnum in both the offices of President and Vice-President, Congress is authorized, not generally, in any mode they may see proper, as by election by one or both Houses, but only by law, to declare, not whoever they willed, not any citizen whom they preferred, but only what "officer" of the United States should act.

So careful, Mr. President, were the framers of the Constitution in every instance in which they permitted a mingling of the powers of the departments, or conferred extraordinary powers on one, to stamp such intermingling or grant as exceptional, and to limit it with precision to the very case permitted. These exceptions, thus carefully limited and defined, add force and weight to the consideration that by construction merely no encroachment on the powers of one department by another should be tolerated.

Applying the rule thus established to the construction of the powers of this body in reference to the appointment of officers, its exact limit can be easily traced. That in giving advice and consent to appointments we do not exercise a legislative power is clear, for by Article I, section 1, of the Constitution it is ordained that "all"—not a part, but all—"legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives."

Legislative power is vested not in the Senate or House separately, but in a Congress composed of both Houses, and therefore vested in both Houses. Besides, legislative power is a power to make laws, not a power to select agents to execute them. The power to appoint to office is clearly under the Constitution an executive power, and is so recognized by the Supreme Court in the case from which I have quoted. But I am bound to establish only that it is not legislative to bring it within the category of being a special and limited jurisdiction outside of the general powers granted to the Senate by the Constitution, and therefore to be confined strictly to the case mentioned in the Constitution.

The power there granted is to give or refuse advice and consent to a nomination made by the President of a person whom he proposes to appoint to office. This is all of it—no more, no less. The Constitution makes no express mention of a power of removal from office except by impeachment. Whether it results to the President as a part of the undefined executive power vested by the Constitution, or is embraced in the power to see that the laws are faithfully executed as a necessary means to perform that duty, as was decided in the First Congress, or comes as an incident to the power to make appointments, or, according to the Senator from Vermont, comes from a grant by Congress to the President, is, though not the main, yet an important issue in this discussion; the main question being not as to the source of the power of the President, but as to the power of the Senate in respect to removals from office. Whatever may be the source of this power of the President, it is disputed by no one that he possesses the power of removal; it is so confessed in the report of the Judiciary Committee and in the resolutions which they recommend for our adoption. To dispute it successfully is to blot out the constitutional history of the Union from the commencement to the present day.

It will justify the time spent to inquire what the fathers of the Republic, what all the Presidents and all the Congresses up to the year 1867, thought as to the source of the power of the President and its nature and extent.

In the First Congress a bill was reported to create a department of foreign affairs. The first clause of this bill (I quote from the Annals of Congress, volume 1, page 455), after recapitulating the officer and his duties, had these words: "To be removable from office by the President of the United States." It was moved to strike this clause out upon the ground, mainly, that the Senate ought to be joined in the act of removal. It was developed in the debate that those who favored the retention of the clause generally agreed in the construction that the Constitution conferred on the President the power to remove, and it was feared by the friends of the power that if this clause was allowed to stand it would be construed as a grant by Congress to the President of a power which he already had under the Constitution.

So Mr. Benson, of New York, moved to amend the second clause of the bill providing for a chief clerk so it should read that he, "whenever the said principal officer [the Secretary] shall be removed from office by the President of the United States, or in any other case of vacancy," shall have custody of the papers, books of the Department, &c. Mr. Benson distinctly declared his purpose in offering the amendment to be to get a legislative construction of the Constitution to the effect that the President had by that instrument the absolute power of removal; and that if his amendment was adopted he would vote to strike the words I have quoted from the first clause of the bill, because they implied that Congress could grant such a power to the President. On this amendment a great debate ensued. Mr. Madison and many other of the most eminent men of that Congress supported Mr. Benson's amendment for the reason stated by him, that it was a legislative construction of the Constitution that the President had the power of removal. No other reason was given in favor of making the amendment, and it was opposed on that ground. It was finally adopted on that ground, and on that ground alone.

Mr. Madison himself seconded the motion of Mr. Benson to substitute words plainly recognizing this power of the President, and declared that the words proposed to be stricken out "certainly might be construed to imply a legislative grant of power;" that "he wished everything like ambiguity expunged and the sense of the House explicitly declared." He further said that "gentlemen all along proceeded on the idea that the Constitution vests the power in the President. * * * Now, as the words proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Benson] expressed to his mind the meaning of the Constitution, he should favor them and would agree to strike out those agreed to in committee."

Objection was made that the House had no constitutional power to make this declaration as to the meaning of the Constitution, and that the mode adopted was indirect and unmanly. Mr. Madison proposed that gentlemen favoring the position that the Senate ought to be joined with the President in making removals should offer an amendment expressly declaring that the removal should be by the President, "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate." This proposition no opponent of the President's sole power would accept. No man was willing to offer such an amendment, and so the vote was taken on the amendment of Mr. Benson, 30 voting for it and only 18 against it. (See Annals of Congress, volume 1, pages 578 to 580.)

The provision in the first clause, which it was feared would give by implication support to the view that Congress could confer such power, was then stricken from the bill. This great debate has been so fully set out in the very able and conclusive report of the minority of the Judiciary Committee that no further reference need be made to it. Suffice it to say that in the First Congress, with the unhesitating and able advocacy of Mr. Madison and the other great men who composed that body, including the illustrious name of Fisher Ames, this construction was deliberately placed on the Constitution, and it was then sanctioned by Washington. The bill was passed as thus amended and approved by General Washington. It is due to the truth of history, however, to say that the Senate, sitting then wholly, as it does now occasionally, with closed doors, many members of it then, as now, unwilling to yield any power which it could plausibly grasp, was equally divided on the question, and the bill as amended was only saved by the casting vote of John Adams, then Vice-President.

This act was passed on July 27, 1789. In ten days thereafter the First Congress, with the approval of the first President, established the War Department, and in this act the exact language above quoted as the amendment of Mr. Benson was used in the same connection and for the same purpose—reaffirming this construction of the Constitution. (See United States Statutes at Large, volume 1, pages 49, 50.) On September 2 of same year, the act was passed establishing the Treasury Department, containing exactly the same language and introduced for the same purpose. (See United States Statutes at Large, volume 1, pages 65–67.)

After this authoritative exposition of the Constitution, declaring the power of removal to be vested by that instrument in the President alone, and rejecting the claim made that the Senate was or could be joined in the act, thus solemnly made in identically the same language in these three distinct and separate acts of Congress, all approved by Washington, that body, deeming that matter as finally settled, proceeded to pass other acts, in some of them making no mention whatever of removals and in others declaring that removals might be made at pleasure, without naming or declaring at whose pleasure and by whose agency. They left this to the Constitution, the meaning of which had been so firmly fixed and settled as to render it unnecessary to make further express declaration on that subject.

I note some of these: In the judiciary act passed at the same session an Attorney-General was provided for, and no mention was made of removal, it being understood then that it was settled that the power of removal was in the President, and the same is true of the district attorneys provided for in the act. This is made, if possible, more evident by the provision in the same act for the appointment of marshals, whose term of office was declared to be four years, "but," I quote the language, "shall be removable at pleasure," without stating by whom, leaving it in the President, where the Constitution had placed it, as declared by that Congress.

I may here remark that I do not discover in the acts of the earlier Congresses any provision made for removal; but in the three first great acts to which I have alluded, except where the act provided a specified term for the officer and then a provision for removal was inserted in order to exclude a conclusion, for fear that by Congress providing that the officer should hold his term for four years, unless there was some provision recognizing the power of removal, it might be considered that Congress had denied it for that time. That was the reason why with reference to marshals in the judiciary act a provision for removal was inserted, the term of those officers being fixed at four years, when with reference to district attorneys, provided for in the same act, there was no provision for removal.

No permanent act was passed in reference to the Post-Office Department for several years, the Congress merely continuing in force that establishment as it existed under the Confederation. On February 20, 1792 (United States Statutes at Large, volume 1, page 232), an act was passed on this subject, and no mention whatever was made about removals, that matter being left as it was fixed by the Constitution.

On March 2, 1799 (United States Statutes at Large, volume 1, page 733), another act was passed on this subject, in which it was provided "that in case of death, resignation, or removal from office of the Postmaster-General all his duties shall be performed by the assistant." Here again power of removal in the President, as a grant from the Constitution, is affirmed, as removal alone is mentioned, without stating the agency by which it was to be made. And the same thing was repeated in the same words by an act passed April 30, 1810. (United States Statutes at Large, volume 2, page 592.)

On April 30, 1798 (United States Statutes at Large, volume 1, page 553), the Navy Department was established, and in that act it was provided that the chief clerk should take charge of the books, &c., "in case of a vacancy in the office of Secretary, by removal or otherwise." Here again Congress expressly recognized the settled construction of the Constitution, of the power of the President to remove, by a failure to state by whom the removal was to be made.

On May 15, 1820, an act was passed declaring that district attorneys, collectors of customs, navy agents, receivers of public moneys for lands, registers of land offices, paymasters in the Army, apothecary-general and assistant apothecaries-general, and commissary-general, "shall be appointed for four years, but shall be removable at pleasure," without mentioning by whom or at whose pleasure the removal should be made. (See United States Statutes at Large, volume 3, page 582.)

Up to and including this date there had not been a single act passed by Congress which pretended even to confer on the President the power of removal. In every one, so far as my researches extend, provisions were either expressly made for the purpose of recognizing that power in the President as coming from the Constitution, and for the purpose of negativing the idea that Congress would or could confer such power, or the same construction was tacitly yet unequivocally affirmed.

In the first three acts, establishing the three great Departments of State, War, and Treasury, the language, as has been shown, was expressly and avowedly selected to fix and determine the constitutional power of the President to make removals. This was not done in silence or by accident, but after long and able debate and full consideration. In subsequent acts of Congress up to 1867 this same construction is uniformly recognized.

If this construction thus solemnly and deliberately made, sanctioned and acted on in practice from the beginning to the year 1867, be correct, then there is no ground for the pretension of the Senate to participate in removals, and, having no such right, it is beyond controversy that the Senate has no power to make the demand for the ground on which removals or suspensions are made. And I believe it is admitted in the report of the Judiciary Committee that this result follows.

This is the crucial point in this controversy, and so Senators claiming this power for the Senate, seeing this, have undertaken to call in question this construction. This has been done both in 1869 in the debate on the bill to repeal the tenure-of-office act of 1867 and during this debate. Senators have rejected this constitutional construction and asserted that the power of removal in the President was not a constitutional power, but was conferred by statute law. This is the very thing which Mr. Madison and his compatriots in the First Congress denied, and, by the amendment of Mr. Benson, thought they had settled forever. In this they were mistaken, forgetting the love of power in the human breast and the persistency with which the claim for power though often rejected would again and again be presented. In the debate in 1869 Mr. Morton charged that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] "was willing to suspend the law (the act of 1867) and allow the President to remove unconstitutionally the appointees of Mr. Johnson, but when he has had reasonable time to perform that duty the law is to come back and place its restraint upon his power."

The Senator from Vermont, interrupting Mr. Morton, said his position was misstated, because he had always "maintained that this is a subject of legislative power; that it does not belong to the President by the Constitution; but that it belongs to the law; that if we suspend the act * * * we merely remit him (the President) to the act of 1820, and all other acts that have provided for these officers, which expressly declare that he may remove them." (See Congressional Globe, first session Forty-first Congress, page 114.) And the Senator from Vermont again in his speech on the 9th of this month, criticising the minority report presented by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH], and expressing some difficulty in understanding it, said:

Perhaps what they meant to say was that it had not been done in cases where the President of the United States had made a removal in the exercise of authority conferred upon him by law, for I believe every law, or nearly every law, down to 1867 in creating offices provided that they should be held at the pleasure of the President of the United States. Even the four-year-office act required that the incumbents should hold their offices for four years, unless sooner removed by the President of the United States.

Mr. President, this remarkable statement made by so eminent an authority justified the pains I have taken to refute it.

No act of Congress passed prior to 1867 ever assumed to confer on the President a power, recognized and admitted from the beginning of the Government down, uniformly and without exception, as already possessed by him under grant from the common master of us all, the people of the United States through the Constitution. Many of these acts, as I have shown, expressly recognized that this power was in the President by constitutional grant, and many others proceeded silently on the assumption that this power was so clearly conferred and so universally recognized as conferred, that no express reaffirmation of it was needed. On any other hypothesis some of these acts would be absurd and unmeaning in stating that the officers named in them were removable at pleasure, without stating at whose pleasure and by whose agency. Such acts are imperfect and incapable of execution except upon the theory that there was another law in existence, which was known and recognized by all, which fixed the agency of removal and named the person at whose pleasure removal was to be made. Such a law was in existence, but it was not an act or statute of Congress, but the Constitution, the supreme law of the land.

In that the Senator from Vermont was wholly mistaken. I say, in opposition to his assertion, that, so far as I have been able to find the various acts, not a single one of them, much less all of them, as he asserted, passed prior to the year 1867 conferred or attempted to confer upon the President the power of removal. In the very act which he mentioned, the act of 1820, as conferring upon the President power to remove the officers named in it at his pleasure, there is no mention of the President. It is a mere declaration that the officers shall hold their offices at pleasure. At whose pleasure? You can not find it in the act, and you can not find it in any other act passed prior to that time. You are remitted to some law to ascertain at whose pleasure and by whose agency this removal should be made.

Can the Senator from Vermont find any other source for the "removal at pleasure" spoken of in the act of 1820? To what law will he refer to ascertain this source, except to the Constitution, and that alone?

This omission, after the construction of the Constitution had become fixed as to the President's power of removal, was in exact accord with the action of Congress in various acts passed, to omit all mention of the power which was to make appointments, except only when Congress vested, under the power conferred by the Constitution, the appointment of inferior officers in the heads of Departments. Wherever the appointment was to be made by the President under his constitutional power, then the statute was silent as to who was to appoint, referring to the Constitution to settle this.

In the act creating the Executive Departments no provision is made for the appointment of the Secretary or head, except to say, "There shall be a Secretary, or there shall be a principal officer," &c. So in the judiciary act, in which provision was made for the appointment of the Supreme Judges and the district judges, Attorney-General, district attorneys, and marshals, nothing is said as to who shall appoint them, referring to the Constitution for that. In the same act it is provided that marshals shall be removable at pleasure, with no statement as to who was to remove; and thus in the same act follow the same rule in reference both to appointments and removals, leaving both to the Constitution, which vested these powers in the President.

I have noted some twelve or fourteen other acts of Congress, including the First Congress, down to 1867, in which the same course is pursued as in the ones which I have mentioned. In many an office is created without stating that the officer should be removed at all; and yet every President uniformly removed such officers at his pleasure. In others, when removal is mentioned, there is no agent mentioned by whom the removal is to be made, leaving that as it was fixed by the First Congress in the three great acts to which I have called the attention of the Senate.

Congress seems to have proceeded to a very large extent, after the passage of these three great acts, on the idea that having settled it they need make no mention of either how an officer was to be appointed or how he was to be removed. In the three great acts to which I have alluded there is no reference as to how the officers shall be appointed. There is a mere statement that there should be a principal officer or secretary in the office, and afterward, all along through, with some few exceptions, to one of which I shall call the attention of the Senate, the statement is that there shall be such and such an officer, without stating how he shall be appointed or how he shall be removed; and yet those officers were regularly appointed under the Constitution by the President, and regularly removed under the Constitution by him.

A notable exception to this will be found in the act passed August 7, 1789, providing for the government of the Northwest Territory. (1 United States Statutes at Large, page 50.) In that act it was decided to continue in force the ordinance of 1787, after adapting it to the Constitution of the United States, and in doing this Congress provided, as they were bound to do, that the officers of the Territory, which by said ordinance were to be appointed by Congress, should be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and it was declared that the President should have the same power of revoking appointments and removing from office that was possessed by the Congress under the Confederation, which power is exactly the same as that which that Congress had declared was vested by the Constitution in the President. This exception, caused by the necessity of adapting the ordinance of 1787 to the Constitution, proves the rule.

Mr. President, it is thus proven beyond successful controversy that in the First Congress a construction was placed on the Constitution that the President had the absolute power of removal; that this construction was acted on and recognized for seventy-eight years; that Congress never assumed to confer this power on the President, but, on the contrary, uniformly acknowledged in the most solemn acts of legislation that the President had the power independent of Congress or either branch of it. So it appears that the assumption that the President's power of removal up to 1867 was from a Congressional grant, and not vested in him by the Constitution, is utterly without warrant.

If this is a power vested by the Constitution, he holds it as a grant from that instrument, to be exercised by him like the veto power, with no other limitation or restriction on it than is placed on it by that instrument. Congress can not take it away from him, nor can Congress impair or abridge it. He holds it and exercises it without responsibility, without accountability, except to the people of the United States, from whom he received his great office, with its great powers and great trusts. He certainly can not be made accountable by one branch of a co-ordinate department of the Government. An attempt on their part to make him responsible to them is a gross usurpation of power which the President is forced by his oath to support and defend the Constitution and by his responsibility to his masters and our masters—the people—to resist by all the means in his power. Up to 1867 the President exercised this power at his will and pleasure, so nominated in every act of Congress which spoke on the subject, and it would now be a base surrender of his high trusts, a betrayal of the confidence of the people, if for any reason he were to yield to this unconstitutional demand of the Senate and submit to make removals according to their pleasure.

Mr. President, if we could suppose that all these great precedents were wrong; that Washington, Madison, and all the other Presidents were wrong; that all the Congresses were wrong; that the Supreme Court in Ex parte Hennen, cited by the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] the other day, was wrong, and that everybody was wrong excepting only the Senator from Vermont and those whom he leads on this floor, and that in fact and in law the Constitution confers no such power on the President, and that his power of removal must come from a grant made by Congress, that does not help the Senate in the issue now made with the President. For if the Constitution has made the executive department equal, co-ordinate, and independent—as has been shown—then it is not in the power of Congress, as to any new executive power they may grant, to destroy this equality, this co-ordination, and this independence, and subject the President to a servility and subservience to any other department, nor to erect in any other department or branch of a department a mastery over him. This supremacy and mastery are here asserted by the Senate, and that constitutes the real issue in this controversy.

If the power to remove an officer comes from Congressional grant to the President, as is asserted by the Senator from Vermont it can come only in virtue of a power vested by the Constitution in Congress to enact a law conferring this power on him. It is therefore assumed in the proposition that the Constitution has vested such power in Congress. It is not among the powers of Congress specifically enumerated in the Constitution; it must therefore come from the eighteenth clause of the eighth section of the second article of the Constitution. This clause comes in at the end of the enumerated powers, and confers on Congress power, in the following language:

To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof.

In these words are embraced all the powers which Congress possesses beyond those specifically enumerated. An analysis of its provisions will show very clearly its meaning and the nature and extent of power it confers; and

First. It confers power on Congress, not on either branch of it separately or on the members individually, but on the two Houses organized into a Congress and acting in their capacity to make laws. Hence it confers power only on a law-making organism; the power conferred is to make laws. Under it Congress can not render a judgment, or perform any judicial act, or exercise any executive function. They can only make laws.

Second. The laws which Congress can make under this grant are not any kind of laws which they may choose to enact, however desirable they may be in the judgment of Congress for the public good, but only those which (a) "shall be necessary and proper (b) for carrying into execution the foregoing" (that is, the specifically enumerated) "powers" (vested in Congress), (c) "and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States or in any department or officer thereof."

But, sir, "necessary and proper" for what? Not merely necessary and proper in the judgment of Congress to attain any good end which Congress may think desirable, but necessary and proper only "for carrying into execution a power vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States or in some department or officer thereof." There must be a federal, that is, a granted power vested by the Constitution somewhere in the Government, or in some department or officer, which, to be properly executed, needs the aid of an act of Congress.

Before Congress can act at all they must first find a granted power; they must then decide that for carrying into execution this granted power legislation is needed, and then that the proposed law is necessary and proper to that end. All these must concur to enable Congress to act.

It must be distinctly borne in mind that the law authorized under this clause is not any law which Congress may choose to pass having merely a relation to, or connection with, or simply affecting a granted power; it must be a law only "to carry into execution," that is, to carry into complete effect, a named granted power. It must be framed to effect that end, and no other; that is, in constitutional language, it must be "necessary and proper" to effect that end. The Constitution means that all the powers granted by it shall be full and perfect powers, not lame, inefficient, inadequate; that, under them, all shall be done and performed necessary and proper for their full and perfect operation. Hence this grant. It does not mean that Congress should impair a power granted by the Constitution, or obstruct it, or in any way diminish its efficiency. It is a grant of a power of execution, not of obstruction or destruction.

If power under this grant is invoked to regulate the exercise of a power vested in a department or officer, then the regulation, that is making rules, can go no further than to make rules for the full execution of the power as granted. Under "regulation" we can not get a rightful authority to change materially or modify in substance or to enlarge or diminish the granted power. The "carrying into execution," into full and complete and beneficial execution, of a granted power by that department or officer in whom the Constitution vests it is not only the exclusive end to be attained by the statute, but it is the sole authority for its enactment.

The power of Congress under this as well as other clauses is purely legislative; that is, to make laws, and this must be kept in mind. Thus if the granted power which needs the aid authorized by this clause be a power vested in Congress, then a statute may be passed providing more fully the means necessary and proper of carrying this vested power into execution. This clause grants power to do this, but it does not give executive or judicial power to Congress for this purpose. So if a power vested by the Constitution in the judicial department needs a law in order to carry it into execution, Congress may enact a statute for that purpose, but in so doing Congress can not per se exercise a judicial power, nor confer on both Houses combined, or on either separately, a judicial power, nor can Congress authorize the Executive to exercise such power. So if it be necessary and proper to enact a law to facilitate or aid in carrying into execution an executive power, Congress can neither exercise itself nor authorize the exercise of an executive power by the judicial department.

Under this grant of power (and so of the others) Congress can not alter or disturb in the least the constitutional distribution of powers among the three great departments—legislative, executive, and judicial. It is a truism, say the Supreme Court in Kilbourn v. Thompson, that the power confided by the Constitution to one of these departments can not be exercised by another; and that the perfection of the system requires that the lines which separate those departments shall be broadly and clearly defined. (See 103 United States Reports, pages 190, 191.)

Congress may grant a new power to either the executive department or the judicial department if such new power be necessary and proper in order to carry into execution a power already vested in either by the Constitution; but Congress can not grant a new power to itself. The new power which Congress may grant to one of the other departments is not a substantive and independent power, for that would be to amend the Constitution. The Congress can only grant to a particular officer or department a new power necessary and proper to enable that officer or department to execute a power vested in him or it by the Constitution. Hence the new power so to be granted must be purely ancillary, simply and only servient and supporting to the granted power and of the same nature, and seeking to attain only the end of full execution of the principal and granted power, and not a new or different end.

If an executive power granted by the Constitution can not be carried into full execution without a new power, this new and auxiliary power must also be executive in its nature; and if a judicial power granted by the Constitution needs a new and auxiliary power, this new power must also be judicial. Congress, in making laws under the Constitution, can not violate or disturb the scheme of the Constitution itself. Congress, in granting auxiliary powers to any officer or department to enable him or it to carry into execution a power vested in that officer or in that department by the Constitution, must follow the constitutional distribution of powers among the departments, so broadly and distinctly marked, as held by the Supreme Court in the case cited.

These principles are fundamental and elemental, and as stated by the Supreme Court, are recognized as truisms in constitutional law. Apply them to the question before the Senate, and the result is clear and certain. Assuming, for the purpose of this argument, that the power of removal always recognized as being in, and now recognized as being in, the President, and always exercised by him, is not (though I think it clearly is) vested in him by the Constitution, but is conferred by a legislative grant, still it is an executive power, and nothing else. If it were not an executive power, it could not be vested in him.

It being an executive power, Congress can not vest any portion of it in any other department of the Government, and more conclusively and clearly if possible no portion of this power can be vested in Congress or in either branch of it. Except where otherwise especially provided in the Constitution neither House can exercise any power but legislative. The power to make laws is the power to prescribe a rule of action for men for the future. The power to remove an officer is a power to perform an act in a particular case under and in pursuance of a law already in existence—a simple power to execute a law.

If I were to admit, if this power of removal be a legislative and not a constitutional grant, that Congress may make the grant on terms and conditions and with limitations and restrictions, this will not help the argument on the other side. For in that case the conditions, limitations, and restrictions must be such as are warranted by the Constitution. The Constitution is the supreme law of the land in all cases, under all circumstances, and in all conditions. Its binding force can not be evaded by any trick of expression, by covering violations under the form of conditions or terms. It is as strong against the stealthy approach of the sapper and miner as against open and direct assault. The terms fixed and prescribed by the act of 1869 are in violation of the Constitution if construed to join the Senate with the President in making removals. They associate with the President in the performance of an executive act a body which can perform no executive function except the two mentioned in the Constitution, and this is neither of these two. In this law, construed as Senators on the other side construe it, there is a mingling in action of two separate and independent departments of the Government, the lines of division between which are broadly and distinctly marked and the functions of each of which are vested in a separate body of public servants.

This separation is declared by the Supreme Court in the case already cited to be one of the chief merits of the American system, both State and National, of written constitutional law. If the proposition were made to substitute the Supreme Court or the House of Representatives or Congress composed of both Houses for the Senate in this mingling of the powers of two distinct departments, its unconstitutionality would be acknowledged by all. Yet if Congress, in imposing terms and conditions on which the executive power of removal shall be executed, can unite the President with the Senate, a legislative body, it is impossible to deny that it may make the same union between the President and any of the bodies I have mentioned.

On this point I will call attention to the remarks made on the repeal of the tenure-of-office act of 1867 by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN]. That distinguished Senator, though not denying the power of Congress to unite the Senate with the President, yet demonstrated the want of constitutional power to do so in these weighty words:

> As a general rule, it is not wise to mingle the powers of the various departments of the Government. There are three great divisions or departments of the Government that stand apart from each other. They form the triangle of public safety, and upon them rest the safety, order, and good conduct of society. These are the legislative, the executive, and the judicial departments. They have been in exceptional cases mingled. The Senate shares with the President in the appointing power, and also shares with the President in the treaty-making power. The Senate forms a part of the legislative power, and it shares the judicial power in the trial of impeachments, thus absorbing one branch of the judicial power. But with these exceptions the three great departments of the Government—legislative, executive, and judicial—are kept distinct. It is not wise, in my judgment, to overlook this division of powers.

The Senator, though intending only to demonstrate the folly and unwisdom of such a mingling of powers, proved its unconstitutionality beyond question.

Mr. President, it is evident that the attempt to unite the Senate with the President in removals from office by statute grows out of the exploded theory that they were so united by the Constitution. It was urged in the First Congress in the great debate to which I have alluded by those who opposed the view that the President alone had power under the Constitution to remove from office, that as the Senate was associated with him in appointments, it followed that they had like association in making removals. But this view was crushed out by the irresistible reasoning of Madison and Fisher Ames and their associates. The decision then made on solemn and high debate was against this heresy in constitutional law, and remained not only unreversed but constantly reaffirmed for seventy-eight years; yet at intervals during all this long period advocates were found for this exploded theory.

Finally, in 1867, when the condition of affairs was such as to embolden Congress to make war on the President and to shackle his hands, a law was passed, not based on the exploded constitutional construction of a union by that instrument of the President and Senate in making removals, but on the new theory that there was no constitutional power in either or both to make removals, but it was a matter solely in the power of Congress. Those entertaining this view illogically enough recurred to the old and exploded theory that the Constitution had united them—as it could if only it had so provided—there being nothing unconstitutional in the Constitution itself. They deemed it equally in the competency of Congress, as in the authors of the Constitution, to unite them, if only Congress had power to legislate on the subject at all. And thus this new theory, which otherwise might have at least been consistent, even if unconstitutional, was framed so as to be both inconsistent and unconstitutional in conferring by act of Congress an executive power on a branch of the Legislature.

Mr. President, it is by these means and by these processes that the American Senate to-day demands a participation in a power which they acknowledge was not conferred by the Constitution, and which I have clearly shown is unwarranted by that instrument, and which if conceded destroys it in its most essential part.

The issue made with the President by the Senate, and made, too, in our own way, initiated and proceeding in its development by the direction of the Senate, presents some startling propositions to the American people. It commenced—so confessed by the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL]—by a call on one of the Executive Departments for the "reasons" on which the President proceeded in making a removal or suspension of an officer in that Department, "or"—such is the language of the letter—"the papers on file in your Department which show the reasons for the suspension."

This letter was signed by one of the most eminent members of this body, as chairman of one of our most important committees, composed of the most distinguished Senators who occupy seats on this floor. It is certain that that committee was entirely competent and fully authorized to interpret the wishes of the majority of the Senate. The subsequent proceedings, though more carefully phrased, in effect demanded of the President to know why and on what evidence he dared to remove or suspend—for they mean the same thing—a Republican official who had been selected by a former Republican administration for an office, which by the constant practice of a quarter of a century, if not by the Constitution and the laws of the land, were the inheritance of the political saints canonized by that party.

I admit, Mr. President, that after this long enjoyment of the offices of the country there grew up a sort of belief in a prescriptive right in these saints to have and enjoy them as personal perquisites, and that the proposal to deprive them of this enjoyment was well calculated to bewilder and confuse the incumbents. But I confess I am somewhat amazed that this interference with what had been deemed a vested personal right to enjoy the salaries and emoluments of office, and to pay political assessments and organize political parties, clubs, and committees, and to run political conventions, and to select other officers for the good people of the Union, should have so unsettled the judgment of the American Senate. I had been accustomed to look on this body as a high council, in which the rights and interests of the States, the creators and bases of our political system and the rights and interests of the whole body of the American people, were debated and decided upon a higher plane, upon more expanded and more patriotic considerations than were usual in any other legislative body in the world. Since I have been a member of this body I have seen little to impair this view and much to confirm it. Of course I do not in this statement refer to executive sessions, the proceedings of which by an impenetrable veil are shut out from the scrutiny and criticism of our constituents, and of which I am not allowed to speak or even to think outside of these walls—the prison-house of our secrets.

I hope I may be pardoned for saying, by way of parenthesis, that from the first secret session I attended to this day I have been ready and willing to vote to consider all executive business in open session, except in cases where the President, in relation to foreign affairs, shall request, for the public interests, a secret session. Returning to the high character of this body, I say I was amazed when it was announced, that however much we might deem it proper to consider our own business in secret, we were determined to claim a monopoly of this vice or virtue, whichever it may be. Keeping with jealous care our own, we demand to have the secrets of all others.

Now, Mr. President, if the Constitution has made us not only the sole depositaries of all the secrets connected with our political life, but has also granted us a supremacy and mastery over all other departments, and we are authorized to demand that the co-ordinate and independent departments of the Government shall, at our beck and nod, communicate to us their own secrets, if they have any, as well as the secrets and confidential communications of private citizens in their keeping, then we are justified in making this issue with the President, so far as making the demand for the papers and documents are concerned. On that point I have already spoken.

I now propose to call attention to the further issue made by the resolutions reported by the Judiciary Committee and recommended by them for our adoption.

Mr. President, this further issue, though growing out of our unconstitutional demand to supervise and review the action of the President, presents the leading and most essential question involved in this controversy. This question is presented for our consideration and action by the resolutions reported for our adoption by the Committee on the Judiciary.

The first resolution expresses our condemnation of the refusal of the Attorney-General, under whatever influence (he was directed by the President), to send to the Senate papers relating to the removal of the district attorney of Alabama, declaring that refusal to be a violation of his official duty and subversive of the fundamental principles of the Government and a good administration thereof.

The second resolution is as follows:

Resolved, That it is, under these circumstances, the duty of the Senate to refuse its advice and consent to proposed removals of officers the documents and papers in reference to the supposed official or personal misconduct of whom are withheld by the Executive or any head of a Department when deemed necessary by the Senate, and called for in considering the matter.

The majority of this Senate, if represented correctly by the Judiciary Committee, construe a nomination made by the President in place of a suspended officer as a proposal to remove the officer suspended; and on this construction the Senate now acts. The proposition of this resolution, therefore, is that the Senate will refuse even to consider a nomination made in place of a suspended officer unless the President will furnish, on the demand of the Senate, his reasons for suspension, as disclosed in "the documents and papers in reference to the supposed official or personal misconduct" of the suspended person.

Mr. President, I will remark—though it is not very essential—that in this resolution all the pretenses and disguises which have been used in this debate about official papers and papers "filed" are laid aside, and the bold proposition is made, as I understood and the country understood from the beginning was the claim of the Judiciary Committee, to have all papers and documents of whatever nature sent to the Senate. I do not understand that the Attorney-General or the President mean to refuse any legal record or any paper or document made in pursuance of law by an officer of the United States.

My purpose, Mr. President, now is to consider the extraordinary, not to say revolutionary, position announced in the second resolution which the Committee on the Judiciary has recommended for our adoption, which recommendation is the present question before the Senate. It not only asserts the doctrine that the Senate has a supervisory and revisory power over the action of the President in making removals, which has been shown over and over again in this debate to be unfounded, but in the attempt to enforce this usurped power it recommends that the Senate shall not consider even the question of confirming the nominee, nor the question of the propriety of removing the suspended officer, unless the very evidence on which the President acted in making the suspension is submitted to their examination and judgment. They will consider no other evidence, however conclusive and abundant it may be, if the evidence on which the President acted and which furnishes the reasons of his action is withheld.

The resolution, I want the Senate to understand, and the country to understand, does not seek for evidence on which to perform a legal duty or an alleged legal duty, but it demands to know upon what ground the President made a suspension, in order that the Senate may in the exercise of their assumed supremacy, review the action of the President and determine, not whether in fact the suspended man ought now to be removed, but whether the President at the time he made the suspension or removal took pains to fortify himself with sufficient written evidence to justify, in the judgment of a partisan majority in this body, the suspension of one of their friends. The question of the propriety of the suspension, if it can ever arise under a power given to the President to suspend "in his discretion," certainly can not arise when months afterward, on a nomination to appoint a successor, the Senate assumes to decide whether the suspended person ought then to be removed.

Why, Mr. President, it is almost too evident to require mention, that a suspension may have been right, as the facts were presented to the President in July, 1885, and a removal or a further suspension in March, 1886, be wrong, and so the one may have been wrong at the first-named period, and the other right now. If the Senate assumes the right to know the grounds on which the President acted, rejecting, as this resolution does, all other evidence, then the Senate assumes a mastery and dominion over the President in undertaking to try him on a record he has made and to render judgment on it. In doing this, it does not even undertake to discharge its usurped duty and power, to decide upon the question of removal. That question, as I have shown, depends on a state of facts as they exist long after the suspension and have no necessary connection with it. Suppose the President, so far as the papers show, not having the fear of the partisan majority of this body before his eyes, removed an officer because he was a Republican, who attended closely to his official business and did not interfere with party politics, and had been appointed originally to the office solely upon his merits as a man, his office having no political significance. Such a removal would be wrong when tested by the President's standard.

But suppose this man had all along been a hypocrite and pharisee, and that after his removal it was discovered that he was short in his accounts, or that having no longer any motive to disguise his true character, he should become a drunkard, a gambler, or a thief, and these facts should be capable of proof at the time the Senate assumed to act. In this case the resolution would require the Senate to refuse to consider all evidence not before the President and to refuse to consider the matter at all unless the President should yield to our demands.

Mr. President, I make these statements so that it may clearly be seen, however different may be the declarations of Senators in debate, that this resolution, prepared with deliberation and care by the Law Committee of the Senate, throws off all disguises, and announces in measured terms that the object of the Senate in making these demands for papers is not to enable them to discharge what they claim to be a legal duty, but to assert their supremacy over the President, to compel a Democratic Executive to yield a degrading and unconstitutional submission to a Republican Senate as his masters. This is plain. But if confirmation is needed it will be found in the fact stated in open session by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK], that the committee which made the demand for the papers in the case which is the foundation of this controversy had in their possession at the time the demand was made conclusive evidence, so adjudged by them, of the unfitness of the person suspended.

Mr. President, when we consider the co-ordination and independence and separation of the several departments of the Government established by the Constitution, marked and distinguished by the broadest and clearest lines, and that the preservation of this great feature in our Constitution constitutes the perfection of the American system of written constitutional law, we may well be amazed at the attempt of the Senate to usurp the unconstitutional jurisdiction over the executive department asserted in the report of the Judiciary Committee and in the resolutions reported by them and recommended to our adoption.

I have shown, and others on this side have shown more ably and clearly than I, that no duty rests with the Senate which authorizes them to make this demand on the Executive. I will add, that having embarked in this unconstitutional warfare on the President, the Judiciary Committee have chosen means for enforcing their demands even more unwarranted than, and equally unconstitutional as, the demands themselves. It is fit, perhaps it is a necessity—possibly it may be the direction of a kind Providence—that the means to be used in this warfare on the President, in destroying the equality and separation in the departments fixed by the Constitution, should be of the character to uncover clearly to the comprehension of all men the true nature of all these proceedings. It is well that this attack on the Constitution should be open and direct and the means of success adopted equally in contempt of that instrument.

The second resolution, in effect and substance, as interpreted by its plain language and the conduct of this body on nominations, in place of suspended officers, announces in advance, commits the Senate to it as a rule, that they will not even consider whether a nomination be fit and proper or not unless the President shall send them the papers they may see proper to demand. The Senate first usurps an unconstitutional jurisdiction to try questions of removal and to try the President for his conduct in making suspensions, and then seeks to make good this usurpation by a refusal to comply with their plain duty under the Constitution. Under the Constitution it is the plain duty of the President to make nominations. He has taken an oath to discharge that duty faithfully. Under that same Constitution it is the plain duty of the Senate to examine these nominations and to advise and consent to them or refuse that advice and consent, as on such examination they shall appear fit and proper or the contrary. We resolve that we will not perform our duty unless the President shall yield to our demands. Our demands being unwarranted, as has been shown, we are guilty of the double wrong of attempting to enforce them by unconstitutional means.

But, sir, if it be conceded that our demands are just and constitutional and the President be wrong in refusing obedience to them, this makes the case no better for us. For then we assert that because the President violates his constitutional duty we will abdicate ours. No more dangerous doctrine was ever announced, no more baneful and destructive practice was ever tolerated.

Why, Mr. President, we equally with the President are the servants of the people. We equally with him hold our offices in trust for the people. The highest duty of this trust is to maintain and preserve the Constitution which the people of the States have established. Can we, then, when we see that Constitution violated by one department, and because that violation may affect what we consider our Senatorial privileges, commit an equal violation of the Constitution because in that we retaliate on the aggressor? A violation of the Constitution by one officer is a justification for its violation by another! That is our position if we pass this resolution.

The officers which the President appoints, though the instruments which the Constitution affords him to perform his duty to execute the laws, are not his officers. They are not his servants. They are the officers of the law and of the Constitution, and under them servants of the people. We can not punish him for a refusal to obey our commands by refusing to consent to the appointment of proper and fit officers to carry on the business of the Government. And yet that is exactly what this resolution does, in order, in the language of the learned Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS], to give "support to a [that] calm, orderly, and constitutional exercise of the functions of government;" but in my judgment, and I will venture to assert in the judgment of history, "in order to secure a party advantage through a violation of the Constitution and a destruction of the best interests of the people."

Mr. President, it is my duty as a Senator to resist this usurpation by all the powers I possess. Never before in my public life have I felt that I had a higher duty to perform for my country than is now imposed to make this resistance, and I never felt so keenly the want of that ability which would enable me to dissuade the majority from this contemplated wrong. But, sir, in my weakness I can call to the aid of the Constitution another. If the majority will not hear, as I know they will not, so humble an individual as I am, possibly they will listen to another. It was said by the Senator from Vermont that Allen G. Thurman was the greatest Democrat in all this land. Well, will they hear him? He denounced the power usurped by the Senate to judge of and prevent removals as a violation of the Constitution. If they will not hear the greatest Democrat in the country, will they listen to another citizen of Ohio, who I will not say is the greatest Republican in all this land, but I will say he is the equal of the greatest? In the debate in 1869 on the repeal of the tenure-of-office act of 1867 this Republican, then and now a member of this body, after demonstrating the folly and unwisdom of that act of 1867 giving to this Senate the authority to interfere with the President's power of removal, and demonstrating also the unconstitutionality of that act, as I have before stated, and proceeding to warn his brother Senators against the attempt to retain this power, said:

> Now, sir, I do not say that public opinion demands the repeal of the act, because here we have nothing to do with public opinion; we are here as independent Senators; but undoubtedly the judgment of the House of Representatives is a very strong indication that they who participated with us in passing the law feel that the object of it has been accomplished, and that now some other mode ought to be devised to control and limit the power of removal by the President. It seems to me that we are now acting as judges in our own case. If this great power of the Senate is maintained to prevent the removal of any officer of this Government, it is maintained by the Senate for its own behalf. The public judgment will say that, although we are not nominally interested, yet by refusing to join with the President and House of Representatives in repealing this law we are maintaining exceptional powers for ourselves, powers that were never conferred upon the Senate until two years ago, and which were then conferred for a special purpose. In my opinion we ought to be careful that our judgment should be impartial, and not be influenced by a love of power.

I call especial attention to these words:

> It seems to me we are acting as judges in our own case. If this great power is maintained to prevent the removal of any officer of this Government, it is maintained by the Senate in its own behalf.

Yes, sir; judges in our own case—attempting to maintain a power denied to us by the Constitution as it was expounded by Madison and Washington and the fathers of the Republic; denied in practice for three-quarters of a century. Are Senators prepared to go before the country on an issue thus made, and for the selfish purpose thus denounced by a statesman?

Mr. President, it has been seen what was the construction of the Constitution by the fathers and the practice under it for seventy-eight years. The change came through the act of 1867, so often referred to as first associating the Senate with the President in making removals. By that act this unconstitutional power was transplanted into our system. It came, sir, both as an exile and an exotic. Though tended and nurtured by the care and genius of the learned Senator from Vermont, it took no permanent root in our soil. It withered and wasted under the genial sun and in the pure atmosphere of our free institutions. So, after maintaining a fitful, stormy, and baleful existence for the short space of two years, it was in 1869 unconditionally repealed so far as the action of the House of Representatives was concerned—that House being Republican by more than two-thirds majority. The vote for its repeal was almost unanimous—138 to 16. It is well to record here that among those voting for its unconditional repeal and thereby restoring the practice of the fathers are the illustrious names of the following, now members of this body, namely: Senators ALLISON, BECK, CONGER, CULLOM, DAWES, HALE, HAWLEY, HOAR, LOGAN, and VOORHEES. In this body the great Senators Fessenden, Morton, SHERMAN, Thurman, McDonald, and many others also voted for and advocated its unconditional repeal. Mr. Conkling announced that he favored repeal or suspension.

The Senator from Vermont, with a majority of the Committee on the Judiciary, having that tender yet unaccountable affection for this monstrosity in constitutional law which it is said parents bear to their misshapen offspring, and being unwilling that it should wholly die, yet convinced that it could not live, endeavored to prolong its miserable existence by that sort of half-death and half-life involved in a suspension of its existence for about a year. Every one of the Senators who favored repeal proceeded expressly on the ground that the statute conferred on or recognized in the Senate the power to prevent a removal from office by the President and that such power was not for the public good, and many of them asserted its unconstitutionality.

In this body there seemed to be no dissent from the proposition that the law of 1867 was, for a time at least, an obstacle to good government. Mr. Morton, speaking for an unconditional repeal, and objecting specifically that it conferred on the Senate the power here claimed by the Judiciary Committee of revising and reversing the action of the President in suspensions and removals, declared that the law never was intended to be permanent; that it was passed for a special purpose, and if it were not then on the statute-book, he stated with emphasis that no Senator or Representative would propose its enactment; that its repeal was demanded by the best interests of the country, and that the administration of the Government could not be carried on efficiently and successfully under the operation of the law; that its repeal was asked for by the sentiment of the whole country with few exceptions; that the Legislatures of Indiana and other States had instructed for its repeal.

And in speaking of the very provisions which are now sought to be enforced, he declared that they made the President a common informer, a position not honorable to his high character and position; that the proposition of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] to suspend the law was a confession that it should be repealed, unless, as he said, that Senator and those voting with him meant by a suspension to give the President time to put their friends in office; and then, having gotten them in, put the stocks on the President and prevent their removal. This indeed, Mr. President, seems to be verified by the action of the Judiciary Committee. Mr. Morton further argued that the question of the constitutional power of the President to remove officers had been settled in his favor by the First Congress, and that this construction had been acquiesced in for seventy-eight years, and it was too late now to endeavor to overturn this construction by acute, subtile, and technical argument.

Mr. Fessenden also advocated its repeal, stating that he had refused to vote for the bill when it was enacted and had predicted that evil would come from it. He insisted that it had the effect to transfer substantially the appointing power to the House of Representatives. He thought the original construction of the Constitution should be restored to it.

The most notable as well as the ablest argument in favor of the total repeal of the act of 1867, and the restoration to the President of his power to remove, exercised for so long a period, and in favor of a denial of the power of the Senate to judge of removals, was made by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN]. He insisted that the power of removal was derived wholly from the statute and did not come from the Constitution; that the Constitution conferred on the Senate no power to remove. "We consent," he said, "to removals. We advise as to confirmations. When a man is removed from office and another name sent here, we pass simply upon his qualifications and fitness for the office;" that the Senate derived its power of removal solely from the act of 1867, then sought to be repealed, and he declared "with such a power vested in the Senate, we shall share in, and finally monopolize, the power of the Executive over all the officers of the Government." He further declared that Senators "must easily draw the distinction between the power of removal and the power of confirmation."

"The power of confirmation is a resultant power, depending upon the previous act of another officer of the Government, and all we can say in our act of confirmation is whether or not the person named is a man fit to discharge the duties of the office." He here again denounced the idea that the Senate, in acting on a nomination to an office, could inquire into and consider the propriety of the removal of his predecessor; twice affirming that the sole duty of the Senate was to determine whether the person named is a man fit to discharge the duties of the office. He also stated that "the executive officers are the proper judges of removals and the causes of removals." "We" (the Senate) "are the proper persons to judge of the character and standing of the person appointed to office."

Mr. SHERMAN also said that "the right of removal by the President during the recess, in my judgment, ought to be absolute, and the appointment only temporary. That is the constitutional provision, and appointments made during the recess can endure no longer than the next session."

Mr. SHERMAN declared that the act could not, with due regard to the public interest, be practically enforced. He then showed how in actual practice it was impossible that the Senate could try and determine the question as to the propriety of removals and suspensions. He referred to the piles of documents which the President had sent to the Senate on the subject of removals and which the committees had not time to examine, to the demands made by every suspended officer—every one of whom, he said, "claimed to be the most innocent man born since the time of Adam"—to have his case tried, converting the Senate into a court and jury to try these cases, and which, under that law, we were bound to do; and with terrible irony he referred to a case where an officer had been tried and condemned and sent to the penitentiary while we were engaged in examining into his case in order to vindicate his character from the charge made by the President.

Mr. President, the most striking argument made against the act of 1867 by the Senator from Ohio is contained in the extract from his speech which I read to the Senate in the earlier part of this argument, in which he presented his objections to the mingling of the powers of the Executive and of the Senate. I again call especial attention to this extract, in which the Senator from Ohio, with a relentless logic, advancing the gravest and most weighty reasons, crushed out this dangerous political heresy and contributed the weight of his great name to securing a restoration of the Constitution as understood by our fathers, and in which also he condemned and denounced in advance the present effort of the Committee on the Judiciary to reproduce by construction the statute of 1867, now long since repealed. And I wish to call attention to the further fact that the mingling of powers to which the Senator from Ohio directed his objections consisted solely in the provisions in that act that the Senate should have the reasons for all removals and have the power to prevent them—the very issue now between the Senate and the President.

Mr. President, in opposition to all these arguments against the power of the Senate, usurped by the act of 1867, to judge of the propriety of removals and to demand the reasons therefor, the most notable response was a confession of their potency, the proposition to suspend the act for about a year, made by the Committee on the Judiciary, and sustained with great zeal and ability by the Senator from Vermont, in giving that support which he then as now felt it his duty to give, to a "calm, orderly, and constitutional exercise of the functions of government."

Between these two propositions, an unconditional repeal of the act of 1867 and its suspension for a limited time, the contest was carried on by the two Houses of Congress, till finally the act of 1869, the statute now in force, was passed and the act of 1867 repealed. In this way and by these arguments was this unconstitutional and pernicious act of 1867 hissed from the stage, on which it had played a fitful and stormy part for the space of two years. It had come in time of revolution, was born of distrust and conflict between the President and Congress, of civic discord and disorder, without constitutional parentage, with no ancestor or precursor in our history—a political bastard, unparalleled in its life, and in its taking off—and, I may add, unmourned save by the Senator from Vermont, and unhonored, save in this attempt of the Judiciary Committee to recall its wicked, restless, and perturbed spirit from the shadowy realms in which it has wandered and suffered for these seventeen years, to renew its mischievous activity as the soul of the act of 1869.

Unrespited, unpitied, and unreprieved,

Mr. President, its fate was a sad one. Its most ardent defenders and its most devout worshipers, with one voice, voted to consign it to the tomb for a year, as a refuge from the execrations of the people whose Constitution it had violated and whose interests it had betrayed.

Mr. President, turning now from these sad scenes, the condemnation, execution, and burial of the act of 1867, "the deep damnation of its taking off" in the house of its friends by the parricidal hands of its authors and creators, let us attend to a more cheerful, if not a more interesting, prospect, the genesis and birth of the act of 1869. It is said there is but a step from the cradle to the grave. In this case the distance was even less, for the grave of the one was the cradle of the other. The pall-bearers of the headless corpse of the act of 1867 were, in the very act of performing the last sad rites of sepulture, the progenitors of the act of 1869.

It is even claimed, sir, that these sorrowing and disconsolate attendants on these funeral rites—still infatuated, still with more than an Eastern devotion worshiping the dead god of their idolatry—by some sort of sleight of hand or political necromancy at the last moment managed to cheat the people of the United States of the results of their act of repeal by substituting the dead corpse of the act of 1867 for the newborn child, the act of 1869. For, sir, it is now asserted that in fact and truth the act of 1869 is nothing but the act of 1867 in disguise, having in it all the evil and unconstitutional powers which caused the repeal of the former. This result, I understand, is to be brought about by the miraculous power of construction—the re-enactment of a repealed statute by acute, technical, and subtle construction, to use a phrase of Senator Morton's, applied to this subject.

I propose now, Mr. President, to inquire whether this remarkable result has been accomplished. Of course it will be understood that what follows refers to the meaning of the second section of the act which relates to suspensions in the recess of the Senate. The proposition of the House of Representatives—passed with almost entire unanimity—to repeal unconditionally and forever the unconstitutional act of 1867 was first met in the Senate with a bill to suspend it for a limited period. The Senate, however, at last made another proposition in the shape of an amendment to the House bill, in which they, after surrendering the provision in the old act requiring the President to suspend only for cause, specified in the act official misconduct, or crime, or corporeal or mental inability, and requiring proof of these causes, and that the President should report to the Senate his reasons and the evidence on which he acted (the very thing now attempted to be done by the Judiciary Committee), and, after giving the President power to suspend at his discretion, they adroitly introduced at the close of the bill a provision in the following words:

And if the Senate during such [next] session shall refuse to advise and consent to an appointment in the place of such suspended officer and—

shall also refuse by vote to consent to such suspension, then, and not otherwise, such officer, at the end of the session, shall be entitled to resume the possession of the office from which he was suspended, and afterwards to discharge its duties and receive its emoluments as though no such suspension had taken place.

As one of the great objections to the act of 1867 was its unconstitutional subjection of the President to the usurped dominance of the Senate, causing him, as an inferior and servant, to explain and give reasons for his exercise of a high duty imposed on him by the Constitution, it was supposed if the provisions requiring this were stricken out, thereby allowing him to act according to his discretion, the Senate might be allowed to retain their assumed power to restore the suspended officer to his place; so this compromise was offered. But the House of Representatives being determined to strip the Senate of this unconstitutional prerogative, and to restore to the President his powers as they had been recognized by all the departments of the Government for three-quarters of a century, rejected this proposition by a large majority. Messrs. ALLISON, CULLOM, CONGER, DAWES, HOAR, and LOGAN, now Senators on this floor, all voted to reject.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator kindly, if I may interrupt him——

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Tell us who the conferees were on the part of the two Houses, and then the discussions that took place on the report of the conference committees in the two Houses.

Mr. GEORGE. I did not understand exactly what the Senator said.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator kindly tell us who the conferees on the part of the two Houses were when the bill went to the conferees——

Mr. GEORGE. I only remember the names of two of the House conferees——

Mr. EDMUNDS. And then the discussion that took place in the House of Representatives?

Mr. GEORGE. I am going to refer to that, and also to the discussion in the Senate on the report of the conference committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And what took place in the House of Representatives the next day or the day following, after the report of the committee of conference in respect to the misapprehension that the House was said to have voted under and what took place in the Senate. He can then perhaps understand exactly what the amended act meant as it was understood by the Senate.

Mr. GEORGE. I can understand that. I shall come to all that directly.

A conference between the two Houses was ordered, and the result was that all this objectionable matter was stricken out, and in lieu thereof was inserted language which makes the last clause of the statute read as follows:

And if the Senate during such [next] session shall refuse to advise and consent to an appointment in place of such suspended officer—

What follows? That, as in the clause stricken out, this suspended officer shall be restored? Oh, no, nothing of that sort; but recognizing the law to be, as the Constitution required it to be, that there was a full constitutional vacancy in the office caused by the suspension, the clause proceeds—

then and not otherwise the President shall nominate another person, as soon as practicable, to said session of the Senate for the said office.

And here the statute ends; and thus it stands on the statute-book today, this agreement in conference having having been accepted by both Houses of Congress.

A reference to this statute will show that the President has power under it to suspend at his discretion. It will also be noted that, in order to define and make clear the effect of suspension, the two Houses, rejecting the pretensions of the Senate, made it by the express words of the statute the legal duty of the President, on suspension, to nominate a successor; and if he were not confirmed by the Senate, then the statute, leaving nothing to implication, nothing to construction, made it again the duty of the President to nominate another person to fill the place. Now, Mr. President, I leave it to the learned Senator from Vermont, and those who agree with him, to explain, if it can be explained, what power Congress has to require the President to nominate a person to fill an office already constitutionally and legally full. And if they in the endeavor to extricate themselves from this dilemma shall insist that though the office was then vacant it became full again on the adjournment of the Senate, then I submit to them this inquiry: How can a vacant office acquire an incumbent by two—yes, the statute requires two—unsuccessful attempts to fill it?

It is said, Mr. President, that nature abhors a vacuum—that is, a vacancy—but I have never heard it claimed that this abhorrence had the effect to suspend the Constitution of the United States; so that this mere silent, yet it seems irresistible, operation of nature's law could discharge the constitutional function of the President of the United States, by whom alone vacancies in office can be filled. Possibly it is the abhorrence of the Judiciary Committee to any office whatever being vacant when there is a Republican politician who is ready and willing to fill it which works out this remarkable result.

Now, Mr. President, it seems to be conceded on all hands that if the suspended officer is not restored on the adjournment of the Senate, there being a failure on our part to confirm a nomination of a successor, the Senate has no right to call for documents and papers showing reasons, as nominated in the resolution reported by the Committee on the Judiciary.

The House of Representatives, when they came to consider and act on the report of the conference committee before set out, took the view which I, following them as well as the clear meaning of the statute, have stated to the Senate.

Mr. Bingham, of Ohio, a distinguished lawyer and chairman of the Judiciary Committee of the House and also one of the managers on the part of the House of the conference, coming fresh from its deliberations and its discussions, explained to the House that in the bill as agreed to the words "suspension" and "removal" were synonymous—meant exactly the same thing; that when an officer was "suspended" under it he was "removed." He expressly stated in answer to a question by Mr. HOAR, now a distinguished member of this body, that under the bill there was no authority to get the suspended officer back into office except by the consent of the President, and that if the Senate should adjourn without agreeing to the nomination of a successor the office was vacant.

General Butler, known to all the world as a great lawyer, was also one of the managers of the conference. He explained the bill in the same way, expressly stating that "suspension" under the bill was "removal."

Mr. LOGAN, now an honored and distinguished Senator from Illinois, took the same view, saying, however, that he would have preferred the simple repeal of the act of 1867 in a few words, but that the bill as reported by the committee of conference did exactly the same thing in a great many words. He was satisfied with what was done, and his objection was only on the score of a want of brevity in the repealing bill. He further suggested that the difference between the report of the committee (now the act of 1869 and being sections 1767 and 1768 of the Revised Statutes) and an unconditional repeal of the act of 1867 was only the difference between tweedledee and tweedledum. To this General Butler assented, only facetiously reversing the order of the use of these two expressive words.

Mr. ALLISON, now an able and distinguished Senator, was so determined to wipe every vestige of the unconstitutional act of 1867 from the statute-book, and to restore to the President his rightful power under the Constitution, and to strip from the Senate its arrogated and usurped claim to dominate and control the President in removals, was not satisfied. Like Mr. Madison, in the great debate in 1789 on this subject, as I have before quoted, he wanted no ambiguity, nothing left to inference; so he stuck at the word "suspend." Notwithstanding the bill as then before the House had given the power to the President to suspend at discretion, had stricken from the statute the provision requiring the President to communicate to the Senate the reasons and evidence on which he acted, had also expunged the provision restoring the suspended officer in any event, and had, as I have shown, left the office vacant if no successor were appointed, like an able and conscientious legislator, as he was and is, fearing trouble, he stuck, as I have said, at the use of the word "suspend" in lieu of the word "remove." He was suspicious. He feared that in the womb of this magical word was stored some legal or technical dynamite, which, though hidden, might at some future time explode and destroy the otherwise clear meaning of the bill. So he demanded an assurance against the possible existence of such secret and hidden enemy to the Constitution. He demanded to be assured that it was a dead certainty that the office was entirely vacant at the end of the session if the Senate should refuse to advise and consent to the appointment of a successor to the suspended officer. On receiving the assurance of General Butler that "suspension" and "removal," as used in the bill, were exactly the same thing, and not till then, he seemed to have got his consent to support the bill, and he thereupon voted for it.

Mr. HOAR concurring in the construction of the bill that the office becomes vacant on the adjournment of the Senate, if no successor should be confirmed, and would remain in abeyance, objected to it on that ground, for he argued that in effect it said to the President that he must put the suspended officer back—a man whom he had declared unfit and unworthy—or he must be compelled to carry on the Government without any incumbent in that office at all. On this ground he voted against the bill on its final passage.

It is thus shown, Mr. President, that the House of Representatives with entire unanimity construed the bill to mean if there was no constitutional appointment of a successor that the suspended officer was not restored. On that construction, and because with that meaning it stripped the Senate of its usurped power to be consulted in removals, and if they refused consent that no removals could be made, the House of Representatives passed the bill.

Mr. President, may I not ask, will these learned Senators—these patriotic Senators, whose positions I have stated, and their associates here who were with them in the House of Representatives in 1869, and acting with them and concurring with them in the construction of the Constitution and the act of 1869, do to-day—Grover Cleveland being President—as they did in 1869, Ulysses S. Grant being President? Will they stand by the Constitution and the act of 1869 as they expounded and construed them, Grover Cleveland having adopted and followed their construction? Or will they, under the lead of the Senator from Vermont, and with the pretense of giving "support to a calm and orderly and constitutional exercise of the functions of government," go back on their own honorable record, reverse their former action, repudiate their sound teachings, and censure the President for doing exactly what they then thought he ought to do, and support the Senate in doing what they then thought they ought not to do and had no constitutional power to do?

Mr. President, I turn now to consider the action of the Senate on this conference report. The Senate had tasted the sweets of "that forbidden fruit," usurped and unconstitutional power. During the preceding two years, for the first time in the history of the country, this body in a time of dissension and irregular action of our constitutional forces had made good the claim asserted at long intervals of time by some of its ambitious members to participate in removals from office made by the President. Within these walls, with the scrutiny of the world shut out by closed doors and an oath of secrecy on the part of all witnesses, Senators, by what has been called "Senatorial courtesy," had been enabled to protect their personal friends and supporters from removal. They had succeeded in enforcing on an unpopular President their unrestrained will and pleasure.

Of course, Mr. President, they were loath to surrender this power. During the progress of the passage of the bill they had resorted to every artifice to retain that which they had usurped. They had at first resorted to an attempt "to suspend" the act of 1867. Failing in that, they resorted again to this magical word, "suspend" as a substitute in the act for "removal" in the displacement of officers. With this word and acute and technical construction they sought to recover the lost field from which they had been driven by the House of Representatives. So, unmindful of the fact that the House of Representatives, who were impartial judges as between them and the President, had decided against them, and unmindful also of the warning given by the Senator from Ohio in language which I have before quoted, that they were judges in their own case and attempting to retain a power never before 1867 conceded, they set up in the debate on the passage of the bill a claim to the powers which had been stricken from it and now asserted by the Judiciary Committee.

And thus, Mr. President, at the same hour of the same day, in this Capitol, dedicated to honor and truth and good faith, to high counsel and debate for the advancement and welfare of the American people and for the preservation of the palladium of their liberties, the Constitution of the United States, was exhibited this extraordinary and unseemly and demoralizing spectacle: that each House, on a question of the gravest importance to the rights and liberties of the people, acting not in haste, but on the maturest deliberation and on full debate, proceeded to give the force of law to an agreement which had been reached between the two Houses through their joint conference committee upon a construction and meaning of that agreement directly contradictory to the construction and meaning placed on it by the other. This needs no comment. It speaks for itself and tells of that disordered and distempered condition of affairs in which the Constitution of the United States, as it had been explained and construed by the Father of his Country and the fathers of the Constitution itself and acquiesced in and acted on for seventy-eight years, was broken and trampled under foot to subserve party interests.

Mr. President, the Senator from Vermont near the close of his great argument, and looking over the dreary road he had traveled and considering how impossible it was even with his unequaled abilities to make good the position of the committee of which he was the head, referring to certain inconsistencies which he imagined had been detected in the Democrats, left the field of argument, invaded the realms of poesy, and in the agony of his distress cried out—

O shame! where is thy blush?

Mr. President, I do not mean, even by a poetic license, to impute to this body, or any member of it, a dishonorable action; but replying to the question of the Senator from Vermont in the same spirit in which he put it, and using a like license, I may well be justified in saying that if this monitor against wrongdoing, provided by a beneficent Creator, did not suffuse with its most crimson hue the faces of the actors in this scene it was a clear abdication of its appointed office.

I might rest this part of the argument safely upon what has been said in relation to the processes by which the act of 1869 was made and the construction put on it by the only impartial and disinterested actors in its passage. But it may yet be said that as the suspension was only till the end of the next session of the Senate, it must be that when that period has elapsed, the suspension being terminated, the officer suspended is restored, unless a successor shall have been appointed. In addition to the answer already made to this view, namely, the plain duty of the President twice imposed by the statute to fill the office, which could not constitutionally be done except the office were vacant—the striking out from the Senate's proposition the provision which secured the restoration of the officer suspended—I will add some other considerations equally conclusive on this point. The statute provides on the suspension of the incumbent for the appointment of a successor. The term used is, that the person to succeed to the office shall be "designated." But designate and appoint are exactly synonymous in this connection, as any lexicon will show, and as recognized by the Supreme Court in United States vs. Ferreira, 13 Howard. He who is appointed to office is designated, and he who is designated is appointed. That this is true is manifest from the provision that this designated person possesses under the statute all the powers and rights of the office, enjoys all its emoluments, gives the bond required of an incumbent for that office, and takes the oath prescribed for an incumbent. This oath requires that he shall swear to perform the duties "of the office upon which he is [I am] about to enter." Having thus entered in the office, bonded and sworn as an officer in that particular office, possessing solely all the powers and rights of that office, subject to impeachment, to criminal prosecution, trial, and punishment for malfeasance in that office, and to civil liability for his acts and omissions in that office, he is in every legal and constitutional sense an officer. That his term expires at the end of the session of the Senate makes no difference, for he, like all other officers, must go out at the end of the term. An executive appointment made during the recess of the Senate goes out at the same time. That he is an officer is undisputed. This designated incumbent being undeniably in that office, the suspended officer must be out. It is certain he has been ejected; that he no longer, during the term of the designated incumbent at least, has power, right, or duty in that office. He is subject to no criminal or civil responsibility growing out of the conduct and management of the office during this period. He has no corporeal possession of the office and no right to it.

Being thus ejected, he is removed, by whatever name the ejection may be called. If he is out he can not get back except through the constitutional door, an appointment by the President. If it be argued that he gets back, being once out, by force of the act of Congress, I answer that Congress has no power to appoint or put one in office. This power is vested by the Constitution in the President.

Mr. MAXEY. I beg to say to the Senator from Mississippi that the point he is so happily making was presented by General LOGAN, then in the House, to the amendment proposed by the Senate. General LOGAN argued that the Senate provided that the President should have the right to suspend from office, but if the person nominated should not be confirmed by the Senate the suspended officer would be restored; and that this was practically putting the executive power in the Senate, and that the conference committee struck that out and relieved the bill of what he regarded an unconstitutional provision.

Mr. GEORGE. This putting persons in office by act of Congress is decided to be impossible by the Supreme Court in United States vs. Ferreira (13 Howard, page 51). There that court, through Chief-Justice Taney, said on this subject:

> And if they [certain commissioners] are to be regarded as officers holding office under the Government, the power of appointment is in the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and Congress could not by law designate the persons to fill those offices.

If the suspended, ejected, or removed person, by whatever name he may be called, be still an officer, what manner of officer is he? He is not a de jure officer, for by law another is entitled to the office; nor is he a de facto officer, for the fact is he is out and can and does perform no official act. The substance of the office is in another. If it be said that he has a sort of shadowy and contingent interest—a scintilla juris—in the office, then I answer that officers under the Constitution of the United States are substances, not shadows; they are real, veritable essences. Congress has no power under the Constitution to create an officer without powers and without duties. No officer can be created except to perform a duty or execute a power under a law passed in pursuance of the Constitution. Officers hold public trusts. If the trust be destroyed the officer is destroyed.

There is a wide distinction between this case and the case of an officer suspended for some fault, there being no incumbent appointed in his stead; but by law the duties of the office are devolved on the incumbent of another office as a part of the official duties of that other office. In that case the officer upon whom are devolved the duties of the office whose incumbent is suspended does not even in name become the incumbent of that office, but he discharges his duties solely as an incumbent of his own office, to which the duties of the first office are for the time being attached.

Mr. President, there is no place in the Constitution for this new idea that officers may be tossed back and forth by the President and the Senate like balls on a play-ground, for the power of the President to put out an officer to-day and for the Senate to put him back into office to-morrow. When the thread of official life is once completely broken it is broken forever, and when the legal continuity of an official incumbency is once destroyed it is destroyed forever. Congress can not itself, nor can it authorize another to chop up and parcel out the term of an office, giving this part to one, and that part to another, and then recalling him who was first displaced to enjoy the remainder. The Constitution deals with substantials, not with the mere names of things. By whatever name—ejectment, removal, or suspension—a complete vacancy is made, it can only be filled by appointment of the President; and so by whatever name—designation or appointment—an office is filled, the incumbent is legally and constitutionally an officer.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President——

Mr. GEORGE. I am nearly through now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GEORGE. No, sir. Wait till I get through, and then you can ask as many as you please. I am tired now, but I prefer to conclude. There will be time enough for me to reply, after I conclude, to any questions the Senator may put.

It fortifies the position that the office is vacant if no successor be appointed; that if this be not so the result is absurd, the suspension being in no useful or substantial sense different from removal. For it is agreed on all sides that if the suspended officer has a contingent right at the end of the session to get back into office without a reappointment by the President, this right may be intercepted by a new order of suspension. Without further comment I submit that the statute can not be construed in opposition to all the reasons for a contrary construction so as to produce this useless and absurd result. This operation of resuspension being continued till the end of the term effects a complete removal. And is it not also the strangest and most useless of all proceedings that the Senate should go deliberately to work to try the grounds on which a suspension is made and to restore the suspended officer when it is admitted that the President, remaining of the opinion he entertained when the suspension was made, can and will legally prevent the restoration?

But, Mr. President, even if all this should be wrong—if it should be established that the President has no power to remove under the Constitution—if the act of 1869 is constitutional when construed as the other side construe it, that the suspended officer is restored by a failure of the Senate to advise and consent to the appointment of a successor, still, sir, it is clear that under the statute the Senate has no power in acting on the nomination of a successor to try and determine the propriety of the suspension or of the alleged proposed removal. The power failing, the Senate can not adopt the resolutions offered by the Judiciary Committee. It is useful here to recall to the attention of the Senate portions of the argument made by the Senator from Ohio from which I have already quoted. He said:

> When a man is removed from office and another name sent here, we pass simply upon his qualification and fitness for the office.

He again said:

> The power of confirmation is a resultant power, depending upon the previous act of another officer of the Government, and all we can say in our act of confirmation is whether or not the person named is a man fit to discharge the duties of the office.

This, Mr. President, is the constitutional view and needs no further support from argument. The act of 1867 was contrary to this view, and for that reason was repealed. But in the act of 1869 this view was expressly adopted. That act provides that the President shall nominate a successor to the suspended person, and then proceeds:

> And if the Senate, during such session, shall refuse to advise and consent to an appointment in place of a suspended officer—then the President shall nominate another person as soon as practicable to the Senate. Now, sir, it is too clear for controversy, if, in acting on a confirmation of a successor, the Senate passes not only on the fitness of the person nominated, but also on the propriety of the suspension or removal, then when it acts the matters involved in the issue are res adjudicata, and ought not and can not be retried. So when the statute directs that a new nomination shall be made by the President, it necessarily enacts, as the Senator from Ohio announced, that no other issue was tried, no other question settled, than such as relates to the fitness of the person nominated. There is no escape from this conclusion.

But, Mr. President, it is said that the President has made suspensions under the act of 1869, has acted under it, and can not, therefore, be permitted to allege its unconstitutionality, and the Senate may resort to the unconstitutional methods proposed in the resolutions of the Judiciary Committee to gain an end only justifiable by the provisions of an unconstitutional law. This proposition, so startling, so destructive of a calm, orderly, and constitutional exercise of the functions of government, which it has been ostentatiously announced is the object of these proceedings against the President, partakes more of badinage and jest than of serious argument. Yet the fact of the President's making suspensions under the act of 1869 is again and again referred to as concluding him in the issue made with him by the Senate.

Sir, if the act of 1869 is unconstitutional, it is null and void; not law. It possesses no vitality, no force, because a higher force, a higher vitality—the Constitution—displaces and annuls it. What kingly prerogative, what jewel in the crown of an imperial autocrat, has the President by which he in any way and by any means, by deliberation or by accident, can infuse life and force into any act of Congress, any act of his own, any act of any other officer or department, or any act of any private person, done and performed against the Constitution of the United States? If the President, if Congress, if any other officer, State or Federal, has entered into a line of action in violation of the Constitution, it is a plain duty to reverse this action. What has been done is of no validity, and what can be done in like violation of that instrument is equally without force. I might rest the answer here. But it would be unjust to the President to leave the implication that he had in any sense violated the Constitution or needed the defense which I have made.

In so far as the President has proceeded to do things prescribed by the act of 1869 he has done only that which he was authorized to do under the Constitution. If the suspension mentioned in that act be as I have shown it to be, a legal removal, then he has made removals in accordance with his constitutional power. If suspension under the act be a true suspension and not a removal, then he has performed only a constitutional act, for the greater power of removal from the whole term of the officer includes the lesser power of suspension, which can be no more than a removal for a part of the term. The unconstitutionality of the act, if it be unconstitutional, consists in that construction of it which gives the Senate the power to revise and control the action of the President. That part of it the President resists, and has always resisted, in obedience to his solemn oath to "faithfully execute the office of President of the United States, and to the best of his [my] ability preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States."

Mr. President, it is argued that the President ought to have no secrets, no confidences; perhaps that he ought to hold his Cabinet meetings in public, in presence of the reporters of the press; that no citizen, no Senator, no Representative, no Federal officer can or ought to have any communication with the President which ought not to be immediately made known to all the world.

Well, Mr. President, suppose this is all so and much more of the same sort is so. Still the obligation of the President to uncover, to make known his thoughts and actions and what he does in his great office and the reasons for what he does is to the American people and not to the American Senate, unless in cases in which the Senate may need information to enable it to perform rightly a constitutional duty. It has been shown that we have no duty to perform in relation to removals from office, and therefore we have no right to information to guide us in that matter. I will undertake to say that the demands of the American people in this respect will be fully met by the President. But, sir, what right have we to complain of secrecy on the part of the President in relation to appointments and removals? Until, sir, we have removed from our own proceedings the veil of secrecy which now conceals them, it ill becomes us to complain that other Departments of the Government do not choose to disclose to us reasons for their action. If the President in obedience to an unconstitutional demand were to send us the evidence on which he acts he would not by that submission take the American people into his confidence; he would only consign the evidence to that storehouse of secrets—the American Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President——

Mr. BUTLER. If the Senator from Alabama will yield for a motion to go into executive session I will make that motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope that will not be done. We ought to finish this matter.

Mr. MORGAN. Does the Senator desire to finish this matter to-night?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, or I shall be perfectly willing to come to an understanding with gentlemen on the other side as to when to take the vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield?

Mr. BUTLER. It is after 5 o'clock. I do not suppose the Senator from Vermont expects a vote now.

Mr. MORGAN. I should like to say to the Senator from Vermont——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield?

Mr. BUTLER. I do not like to be discourteous, but I insist on my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion not being debatable, the question is on the motion of the Senator from South Carolina that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. EDMUNDS called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the rule.

Mr. GRAY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called). I asked the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] to pair with me to-day, and I see he is out of the Chamber. I withhold my vote.

Mr. BERRY. My colleague [Mr. JONES, of Arkansas] is paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. MAXEY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. PLUMB (when his name was called). I am paired on this question with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST.]

Mr. SABIN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. CAMDEN. I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. GEORGE (after having voted in the affirmative). I am paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. PIKE] on party questions. As this has taken a party turn, I ask the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] if he regards it as a party question?

Mr. BLAIR. I think this is a party question; I am sure that most of the Senators do.

Mr. GEORGE. Then I withdraw my vote.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN].

Mr. BROWN (after having voted in the affirmative). I am paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH]. I do not regard this as a party question, but as it seems to have partially, at least, assumed that phase, I withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 18, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—18.

Berry,	Evarts,	McPherson,	Ransom,

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator from South Carolina withdraw his motion until I can make a statement or suggestion?

Mr. BUTLER. I will for a moment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to suggest to the gentlemen on the other side that we come to an understanding as to when we shall vote on these resolutions; and I propose that we terminate the general debate to-morrow at 5 o'clock in the afternoon, or the next day if gentlemen prefer so to fix it, and give the Senator in charge of the resolutions an hour to make a general reply, and then take the vote.

Mr. COCKRELL. How can the Senator make an agreement with the Senators on this side when I understand there are either four or five gentlemen on the other side who want to speak?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am not proposing myself to make any agreement. I am speaking to the whole Senate, and ask whether they are willing to come to an understanding, as we often do about things that drag out, to come to a vote at a certain time, giving time enough for everybody that wishes to speak to do so. Instead of to-morrow, therefore, I am willing to say the next day, if there are so many who wish to speak as seems to be supposed.

Mr. COCKRELL. I only a few moments ago undertook to find out how many are going to speak, and I think there are seven or eight yet to speak, and I hardly think it would be justice to them at this time without previous notice or consultation to fix an hour that might cramp them in their time when everybody else has had ample time. I am not going to speak myself, and therefore I can talk about it with perfect freedom. I should be very glad to see it end at once, so far as I am concerned, and it would have ended without a beginning.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have no doubt the Senator would have been glad to have it ended without beginning.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not see how we can come to an agreement just now that would be justice to Senators, some of whom are absent. One or two Senators on this side who expect to speak are not here, and I do not know what length of time they will want to occupy. If we fix an hour and one or two speeches occupy the whole time until that hour comes, no justice would then be done to the others.

Mr. BUTLER. I will make a proposition to the Senator from Vermont, that we adjourn now with the understanding that to-morrow at 4 o'clock or 5 o'clock we come to some agreement as to when we shall vote. I think that would reach his object.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My only object is to get on with the business of the Senate of which I think this is an important part, and other matters are also important, and the debate has gone on a good while. I desire to come to some understanding that is mutually agreeable, to do all the work we can and reach a vote. That is all I wish to do. I do not wish to cramp anybody.

Mr. MORGAN. I regret very much that I took the floor this evening, inasmuch as it seems to have provoked a desire on the part of the Senator from Vermont to transgress the ordinary rule, which has been quite a surprise to me. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] very frankly, in consideration of certain personal considerations operating on me, yielded his place in the debate to me, with the understanding that he would go on to-morrow after the conclusion of my remarks, and therefore I undertook to take the floor this evening. I am sorry my appearance on the floor in this debate has caused the honorable Senator from Vermont to feel that there was some reason for wishing to get rid of any further speech-making in the matter.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from Alabama gives me a great compliment and does me a great injustice at the same time. I have stated on two or three former occasions that I hoped the Senate on the next day would "sit it out," as on every topic unless we can come to an understanding we are obliged to do, as everybody knows in this Chamber. It was not therefore the grace and pleasure of our listening to the Sentor from Alabama which would tempt me to stay here until midnight or some such time that led me to make the suggestion. It was only to get on with this affair, like every other, in some fair way, so that all sides could have their say and reach an understanding and come to a vote.

Mr. BUTLER. How does the suggestion I have made strike the Senator? That seems to be fair. I have no idea of making a speech myself.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator repeat it? It was not heard over here.

Mr. BUTLER. I am, like the Senator from Missouri, quite willing to vote now, but I have supposed there are other gentlemen who would like to be heard.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from South Carolina repeat his suggestion? It was not heard over here.

Mr. BUTLER. My suggestion was that we adjourn now, with the understanding that at 4 or 5 o'clock to-morrow we come to some agreement as to when a vote shall be reached.

Mr. HARRIS. By that time we shall probably ascertain with certainty who desires to be heard on this question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That does not amount to much; but under the circumstances, as I do not wish to press anybody—I only wish to have the Senate determine its own affair; to decide when it wishes to bring this matter to a close; and it was that which led me to ask for a division on the question of not going on now, so as to bring it sharply to the attention of the Senate and have it finished—if the Senator from South Carolina suggests, as he does, that we can probably come to an agreement to-morrow, I shall not object to stopping now with that understanding.

Mr. BUTLER. I think we can do so by that time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The understanding is that we shall then come to an agreement about it?

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. With the understanding that at 4 o'clock to-morrow some arrangement shall be made, the Senator from Missouri moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BUTLER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion takes precedence. The Senator from South Carolina moves that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 34 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 23, 1886.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of yesterday.

Mr. MCKINLEY. I move that the reading of so much of the Journal as relates to the introduction and reference of bills and resolutions be dispensed with.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

The remainder of the Journal was read.

CORRECTION.

Mr. MCRAE. I desire to make a correction.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire to correct the Journal?

CLASSIFICATION, ETC., OF UNITED STATES OFFICIALS.

Mr. COX, from the Select Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, reported back favorably a bill (H. R. 6855) to secure an equitable classification and compensation of certain officers of the United States; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

EVIDENCE OF DISPUTED HANDWRITING.

Mr. RANNEY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported, as a substitute for H. R. 1932, a bill (H. R. 7212) providing for evidence in cases involving disputed handwriting; which was read a first and second time, referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

House bill No. 1932 was ordered to be laid on the table.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES FROM STATE COURTS.

Mr. SENEY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back with favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 1751) to amend sections 2 and 3 of an act entitled "An act to determine the jurisdiction of circuit courts of the United States, and to regulate the removal of causes from State courts, and for other purposes;" which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MOTION TO RECONSIDER.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to enter a privileged motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SPRINGER. I wish to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the House rejected the bill (S. 812) granting a pension to Mrs. E. A. Benham. I will state that I propose to call this up on Friday next. I desire to examine the case myself, as I voted without having an opportunity of making any examination of the papers upon which the claim is founded, and am not able to determine yet whether I shall vote for or against the bill.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GOFF. Mr. Speaker, I wish to submit a report from the Committee on Naval Affairs for immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it can not be made now. The rule provides that immediately after the call of committees for reports the Chair shall again call the committees for one hour for the consideration of such measures as may be presented by them.

Mr. GOFF. When would it be in order to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of this report?

The SPEAKER. In the morning before the House begins the execution of the order under its rules. The report may be made now if the gentleman desires it. The Chair will receive the report, but it can not be considered for the reason stated.

Mr. GOFF. I will withdraw the report for the present.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule for the consideration of bills the hour begins at fifteen minutes after 1 o'clock, and the call rests with the Committee on War Claims.

FOURTH OF JULY CLAIMS.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on War Claims I call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 4731) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department.

I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill to which I have referred.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of a bill which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk proceeded to read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the several persons in this act named the several sums mentioned herein, the same being in full for, and the receipt of the same to be taken and accepted in each case as, a full and final discharge of the several claims examined and allowed by the proper accounting officers under the provisions of the act of July 4, 1864, since January 21, 1885, namely:

Mr. RICHARDSON. I imagine that it will be hardly necessary to read the long list of claims, numbering ten hundred and twenty-two, covered by this bill. I therefore ask unanimous consent that it be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection that order will be made.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, this bill now under consideration is one to make appropriations to pay the list of claims submitted to the House by the Secretary of the Treasury in his letter of date January 16, 1886. These claims are ten hundred and twenty-two in number, and all of them are claims arising under what is familiarly known as the 4th of July act of 1864. They have each been carefully investigated and allowed by the proper accounting officers of the Government. The aggregate amount provided for in this bill is $238,200.64. It is apparent therefore that the vast majority of these claims are for small amounts, and the claimants in the main are poor people. It will be seen by proper calculations that the average sum due to each of the ten hundred and twenty-two claimants is only $233.07. Under the law of July 4, 1864, the Government determined to pay for certain quartermaster and commissary stores taken and used by the armies of the United States.

The express conditions of said act were, first, the stores or supplies must be taken in States not in rebellion; second, that the claim was just; third, that the claimant was loyal; and fourth, that the stores were actually received or taken for the use of, and were used by, the Army. The claims therefore come only from loyal States, and the money goes only to loyal men in these States. The Quartermaster-General or the Commissary-General, as the case might be one of quartermaster or commissary stores, was to cause said claims, in each case, to be examined and investigated, and if satisfied from the proof that all the conditions precedent were favorable to the allowance of the claims they were to be reported to the Third Auditor of the Treasury with a recommendation for settlement. If upon this examination by the Third Auditor they are found correct, he in turn was to pass them to the Second Comptroller for further examination.

After these various investigations and examinations of the claims, and their justice and validity established, the Secretary of the Treasury reports them to the House for the consideration of Congress. These claims set forth in the bill under consideration have all passed the ordeal I have mentioned, and have been regularly allowed by the proper officers. Every condition precedent to their allowance has been found in their favor after the most painstaking investigation by the tribunal constituted by law to investigate them. The proof in every case was taken by special agents of the Quartermaster's Department sent out for that purpose, and it was taken in the various localities where the claims arose. For more than twenty years these parties have been kept out of their money, and no interest is allowed in any case. By a reference to the bill it will be seen that in at least 75 per cent. of the cases the money now goes to administrators and heirs, so that, Mr. Chairman, this bill is really and in fact one for the benefit of the widows and orphans of the land.

Your committee find upon examination of these claims that in about 95 per cent. of them the amount claimed, and I may add often clearly proven, is cut down 60 to 80 per cent. We learn from the Departments that at least 60 per cent. of the claims filed are rejected in toto. The money paid out under this bill will be distributed as follows: My own State, sir, Tennessee, has within her borders six hundred and forty of the claims, amounting to $177,874.52. The State of Kentucky comes next with two hundred and twenty-three claims, amounting to $32,888.42. The State of Missouri next, with forty-three claims, amounting to $8,464.03. The State of Maryland next, with twenty-one claims, amounting to $2,874.70, and so on with the States of Indiana, Pennsylvania, and others getting smaller sums. My own State, it will be seen, obtains much the larger portion of this money. Her people are entitled to it, Mr. Chairman, for no State in the Union gave more of its abundance to feed and supply the armies of the United States than she did while war was flagrant. Her granaries were made empty, her smoke-houses left vacant, her fair fields devastated and laid waste, her live stock consumed; in short, her almost inexhaustible resources consumed to feed and supply the armed men of the Government. It is but fair, even at this late date, to make some kind of remuneration to these people.

The late Senator from Massachusetts, Hon. Charles Sumner, speaking of the dealings of this Government with her creditors, and these claimants are simple creditors, on one occasion said, "We have the meanest and most dishonest Government in the world." I shall not, sir, agree Mr. Sumner was right; on the other hand, I think we have the best Government the world ever saw. But I do say here and now that if an individual, having the power to do so, were to treat his creditors as the poor claimants in this bill have been treated and as scores and hundreds of similar claimants are now being treated, such individual would not only be properly characterized as mean, but as dishonest also. If States were to deal with their creditors in the same way they would at once have the charge made against them that they were guilty of repudiation.

If the Government, sir, displayed one-half the alacrity to do justice in its dealings with these poor people for whom I speak to-day and whose property it took and consumed a quarter of a century ago that it manifests in dealing with its rich bonded creditors in unjustly converting their demands into gold obligations and in extorting gold or its equivalent from a tax-ridden people to increase the fortunes of that class of creditors, there would be no just cause for the criticism made by the late Senator from Massachusetts.

I ask, Mr. Chairman, the prompt and immediate consideration and passage of this bill, that the partial justice it affords them, so long deferred, may at last be meted out without further delay to the claimants mentioned therein.

Mr. KLEINER. Mr. Speaker, some of the claims covered by this bill were presented by citizens of Indiana, and grew out of what is known as the "Morgan raid" during the month of July, 1863.

It is further known that the confederate General Morgan invaded Indiana during the month of July, with about four thousand men, mostly mounted, and by rapid marches crossed some of the southeastern counties of the State. That at that time the Federal troops were in the South, leaving the State in a defenseless condition.

To repel this invasion, Generals Hobson, Wolford, and others were ordered by the Federal commander of the Department of the Ohio to cross the Ohio River from Kentucky to Indiana in pursuit. That to enable these troops to overtake the rebels only mounted men were available, and to mount their troops for this emergency orders were given to seize any horses along the line of pursuit required for the use of the army.

Hence these claims are about all for horses, saddles, and bridles so taken. There was not even time, as the testimony of the Federal officers shows, to give the usual vouchers or other evidence of seizure, but the Legislature of Indiana created a commission to take evidence upon the ground and report to the governor of the State the time, place, and kind of property taken as well as the actual cash value thereof due to each person.

The gross amount found due by the commission and reported in this bill now under consideration is $2,834.05, and the amount due each individual claimant ranges from $40 to $353.05, the latter sum being for three horses. All of the property, as stated heretofore, was taken by orders of Hobson and Wolford.

Mr. WARNER. You ought to present the claims to these gentlemen here for settlement. [Laughter.]

Mr. WOLFORD. I have not got the money.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. And I do not want to pay them. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. KLEINER. General WOLFORD here says he has not got the money to pay, and my friend Mr. STONE, whom I had the pleasure of escorting to the Ohio penitentiary about that time, says he does not want to pay them. [Great laughter.]

It may be proper for me to say here that Brother STONE was at that time a gallant soldier under that intrepid confederate cavalryman and I a humble soldier under Hobson in pursuit; that after the surrender of the former at New Lisbon, Ohio, some of his command was, with due solemnity, escorted to the Ohio penitentiary, then the most available military prison.

I have personally investigated the twenty-two claims presented in this bill, and fully believe that every one is just and should be paid. The amounts presented here for payment do not represent 30 per cent. of the amounts claimed by those originally injured.

The horses taken were in no case returned, nor has payment ever been made by the State of Indiana or the United States. The necessities of the time and place left no way open to save the property of these people, and now after nearly twenty-three years the least that the Government can do is to repair the losses so long since incurred.

The loyalty of these people, being citizens of Indiana, is of course beyond dispute, and is fully proven in the testimony filed in each case.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Will my colleague allow a question?

Mr. KLEINER. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Did I understand you to say that these claims in Indiana were for horses taken by Morgan when he went through there on his raid?

Mr. KLEINER. I said they were taken by the commands of Generals Hobson and Wolford when they were following Morgan on his raid through Indiana; that they were taken as a military necessity.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. On this side of the House we understood the gentleman to say that they were taken by Morgan. I think we could not afford to pay for all the horses Morgan took.

Mr. KLEINER. The gentleman misunderstood me, since the claims presented here were for property taken by order of the Federal forces as a military necessity. Morgan doubtless took many, but no claims are made here for any he took, so far as I know. General WOLFORD, who is here, and led the advance, doubtless will verify the taking by his authority many of the horses reported in this bill, as his testimony and the testimony of others shows.

Mr. Chairman and gentleman, this bill is fairly and justly presented, and I hope it will be ordered engrossed and passed at once.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire to offer some formal amendments. Many of them are merely clerical.

The proposed amendments were read, and agreed to.

Mr. TAULBEE. I submit the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding after line 1947 the words:
"To David Collingsworth, of Magoffin County, $115."

Mr. TAULBEE. With reference to this amendment I desire to make a brief statement. This is a claim for a horse. The claim was filed with the Quartermaster-General, was examined by a special agent, and was adjudicated by the Quartermaster-General and by him allowed and certified to the proper accounting officer in the Auditor's office, and by him approved and passed and certified to the Second Comptroller of the Treasury; by him approved, and sent back to the auditing office to be included in the 4th of July bill. I have letters from the Quartermaster-General, from the Auditor's office in the Treasury, and from the Second Comptroller setting forth these facts, which letters are now on file with the Committee on Claims, to be considered in connection with a bill introduced by myself in the present session of Congress, that places this claim precisely on the same footing, as I understand it, with all the other claims in the bill. I simply ask that it be included in this bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I think the amendment is obnoxious to the point of order, and I make the point of order against it. There is a bill, as the gentleman has stated, already pending in the House exactly the same in substance.

Mr. TAULBEE. I do not think I made any such statement.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Kentucky to say there was a bill pending before the Committee on Claims.

Mr. TAULBEE. I stated that those letters were filed with the Committee on Claims, not the Committee on War Claims, to be considered in connection with a bill I had introduced. The bill, however, does embrace the substance of this amendment. I had it referred to the Committee on Claims after conferring with some members on the Committee on Appropriations, and with the hope that it might be sooner reached in that committee than any other committee.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I ask the gentleman from Kentucky if this is not a claim which would in the regular course of events be reported with the next bill providing for these claims?

Mr. TAULBEE. Yes, sir.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Then I suggest to the gentleman to let it go until that time. I suppose there are dozens of members of Congress who represent constituencies from which come the claims embraced in this bill who are in the same position as the gentleman from Kentucky. I have no doubt the gentleman's claim is correct, but I do doubt the expediency of his constituents and others anticipating things in this irregular way.

Mr. TAULBEE. I desire to state——

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order must be first disposed of. The Chairman understands the gentleman from Kentucky to say there is a bill pending substantially the same as this amendment.

Mr. TAULBEE. I confess under the rules of the House the amendment is subject to the point of order; but I hope gentlemen will not insist on it when they understand that this claim is one in favor of a man who has waited, like all these other claimants, for a number of years, and who is now very sick, old, and in needy circumstances, and concerning whom such satisfactory presentations of facts have been had by the various Departments as to induce them to put this claim through by what is known as a special order for relief of needy claimants.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Will the gentleman allow me——

Mr. TAULBEE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. This discussion is out of order. The point of order having been made that this claim is now pending before a committee of the House, that question of order must first be disposed of.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I wish to say as to the point of order that I would not insist on it so as to defeat the application of my friend from Kentucky but for the fact that the committee have pending before them applications to amend this bill to the amount of nearly $70,000; and if we open the door and admit one amendment there is no stopping it, and the result will be this bill will become the general appropriation bill of this House. We can not afford that, and I insist on the point of order.

Mr. TAULBEE. Can I make this statement——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can only speak by unanimous consent except to the point of order.

Mr. TAULBEE. I will not ask unanimous consent. I wish to add a few words in answer to what has just been said by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN]. We understand, Mr. Chairman, that these claims are all meritorious. I am in favor of this bill, and I do not introduce this amendment to delay or endanger the passage of the bill. These claimants are entitled to speedy relief. But I can not see the propriety of keeping out other claims equally meritorious though it might necessitate the offering of quite a number of amendments to this bill and involve a considerable amount of additional expenditure.

If these claims are all upon the same basis, I see no reason why the bill would not be, under any rule of right, subject to these amendments. If these cases to be cut out by the point of order are as meritorious as those included in the bill, I can see no propriety in the point of order being made to exclude them. These claims have waited for a number of years. While the Government of the United States has been very prompt in its payment of certain kinds of indebtedness in which the masses of the people are not interested, men whose property was taken during the war to promote the cause of the Union, and who have lain out of their money and of the interest upon it during all these years, are now to have their claims cut down to a pittance (as we learn from the statement of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] in charge of this bill), without, as we may justly conclude, due regard being had to the value of the property taken. I see no reason why the rules of this House should be applied to cut down these claims or to delay payment of them, when in many instances, as in the one embraced in this amendment, the property taken was of indisputable value and was taken in an emergency for the use of the Government. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon the point of order.

Mr. GEDDES. Mr. Chairman, I desire to have the gentleman [Mr. TAULBEE] feel entirely satisfied with regard to the action of the committee, and I am in sympathy with him in regard to getting this amendment put upon the bill. Therefore, if I may be permitted, I wish to ask him a question.

Mr. TAULBEE. Certainly.

Mr. GEDDES. This particular case has not been before the committee and we have not had an opportunity to investigate it. Various other bills, represented by gentlemen who have seats on this floor, have been submitted to us, and we have had time and opportunity to investigate them, and have come to the conclusion that they are just and proper, yet we have declined to add them to this bill. Now, if your bill is taken up, which has not been before the committee at all——

Mr. RICHARDSON. Or before any other committee.

Mr. GEDDES. Or before any other committee—if that bill is taken up to the exclusion of these others, it will, of course, work great injustice to them.

Mr. TAULBEE. Mr. Chairman, may I be allowed to say that I did not intend——

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is pending. This discussion is out of order, but the gentleman may proceed by unanimous consent.

Mr. TAULBEE. I know the point of order is pending, but I ask the indulgence of the committee to say an additional word in order that I may not be misunderstood in this matter. I do not wish to be understood as having intended to reflect at all upon the Committee on War Claims. I know they have had no opportunity to consider this bill. Neither do I consider it indispensably necessary that they should have an opportunity to consider this or any other bill. I do not wish this amendment to be adopted before it is properly considered by a committee, but if I understand the matter we are now in committee, we have a right now to consider this bill regardless of what other committee of the House may have previously considered it or what committee of the House may not have considered it in their committee-room. I know that so far as this bill is concerned the Committee on War Claims are guilty of no laches and have not been derelict in any duty.

This bill, because of its having been delayed in passing through the office of the Second Comptroller until after the 4th of July bill was certified to the House, did not go to that committee at all. The committee therefore have done their duty, but I hold that it would be unjust to a worthy and loyal man whose property has been converted to the use of the Government to insist now upon the point of order and thus to delay payment of his claim until a time when, in all human probability, he may not be alive to enjoy the benefit of it. Let us do right. We can always afford to do right and to render justice to every man. No rule need be applied when the application of it will work injustice to a man who has an honest and equitable claim against the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. GEDDES. Does the gentleman know the fact——

Mr. KLEINER. I demand the regular order.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I make the point that a point of order is now pending before the House and should be decided by the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN The point is well taken. The Chair has already stated that this discussion could proceed only by unanimous consent. Objection having been made to its proceeding further, the Chair decides that the point of order is well taken.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee now rise and report this bill to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration a bill (H. R. 4731) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department, and had instructed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments and with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I now move the previous question upon the adoption of the amendments and upon ordering this bill to be engrossed and read the third time.

The motion was agred so.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the adoption of the amendments. Unless separate votes be demanded, the question will be taken upon the amendments in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RICHARDSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SPRINGER (when the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice was called) said: Mr. Speaker, it was the intention of that committee to call up a very important bill in regard to the salaries of certain officers of the United States courts, but I do not see the chairman of the committee in his seat. I am not a member of the committee, but I ask unanimous consent that the committee may not lose its place in this call.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice may be allowed to call up business of that committee, if they desire to do so, when the chairman, who is now absent, makes his appearance on the floor. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

CONGRESSIONAL LIBRARY BUILDING.

Mr. SINGLETON (when the Committee on the Library was called) said: Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on the Library to call up the bill (H. R. 1297) authorizing the construction of a building for the accommodation of the Congressional Library. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. CRISP in the chair), and proceeded to the consideration of the bill, which was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 1297) authorizing the construction of a building for the accommodation of the Congressional Library.

Be it enacted, &c., That a fire-proof building, for the accommodation of the Library of Congress, shall be erected east of the Capitol, and either between B street north and East Capitol street and First street east and Second street east, or between B street south and East Capitol street and First street east and Second street east, and as the commission hereinafter provided shall determine; and the construction of said building, substantially according to the plan submitted to the Joint Select Committee on Additional Accommodations for the Library of Congress, by John L. Smithmeyer, in the Italian renaissance style of architecture, with such modifications as may be found necessary or advantageous, without materially increasing the cost of the building, shall be in charge of a commission composed of the Secretary of the Interior, the Architect of the Capitol Extension, and the Librarian of Congress, who shall be authorized and directed to make contracts for the construction thereof, after proper advertisements and the reception of bids; and the sum of $500,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to commence the construction of said building; and the moneys appropriated for said building shall be disbursed by the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 2. That in order to procure a suitable site for a building for the Library of Congress so much of the land situated east of the Capitol grounds above described shall be purchased by said commission, or taken for public use as hereinafter provided, and not less than the whole of that portion bounded on the north by B street north, on the east by Second street east, on the south by East Capitol street, and on the west by First street east; or if that portion should not be so purchased or taken for public use, then the whole of that portion bounded on the north by East Capitol street, on the east by Second street east, on the south by B street south, and on the west by First street east; and a sum of money sufficient to pay for said land, in the mode hereinafter provided, is hereby appropriated therefor out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 3. That said commission shall be authorized to purchase said land, or any part thereof, as soon as practicable, at such prices as may be fixed by agreement between said commission and the respective owners: Provided, however, That said commission shall not pay in the aggregate for the site aforesaid, including the whole of said land as described lying north of East Capitol street, or the whole as described lying south of East Capitol street, more than $550,000; and if they are not able to purchase the whole of either portion of said land, they may purchase any parcels thereof, for sums not exceeding, in their best judgment, that portion of $550,000 which the value of the parcel or parcels purchased bears to the value of the whole land; and payment therefor shall be made to the respective owners, on the requisitions of the Secretary of the Interior, upon the release and conveyance of said land to the United States by good and sufficient deeds executed in due form of law: And provided further, That no money hereby appropriated shall be expended for the purchase of said land, or any part thereof, or for the erection thereon of said library building, until the written opinion of the Attorney-General shall be had in favor of the validity of the title to said land.

SEC. 4. That if said commission shall be unable to purchase the whole of said land lying north of East Capitol street, or the whole of said land lying south of East Capitol street, by agreement with the respective owners, within thirty days after the passage of this act, within the limitations prescribed by this act, they shall, at the expiration of such period of thirty days, make application to the supreme court of the District of Columbia, at a general or special term, by petition containing a particular description of the property required, with the name of the owner or owners thereof, and his, her, or their residence, as far as the same can be ascertained, which court is hereby authorized and required, upon such application, without delay, to ascertain and assess the damages occasioned by the taking of said land to each owner thereof, or to any person having a legal claim to said damages, in the manner provided with reference to the taking of land for highways in the District of Columbia.

SEC. 5. That the fee-simple of all premises so appropriated for public use of which an appraisement shall have been made under the order and direction of said court shall, upon payment to the owner or owners, respectively, or to such person as shall be authorized to receive the same for any such owners, of the appraised value, or in case the said owner or owners refuse or neglect for fifteen days after the appraisement of the cash value of said lands and improvements by said court to demand the same from the Secretary of the Interior, upon depositing the said appraised value in said court to the credit of such owner or owners, respectively, be vested in the United States; and said commission is hereby authorized and required to pay to the several owner or owners, respectively, or to such persons authorized as aforesaid, the appraised value of the several premises as specified in the appraisement of said court, or pay into court, by deposit, as hereinbefore provided, the said appraised values.

SEC. 6. That said court may direct the time and manner in which possession of the property condemned shall be taken or delivered, and may, if necessary, enforce any order or issue any process for giving possession. The cost occasioned by the inquiry and assessment shall be paid by the United States; and as to other costs which may arise they shall be charged or taxed as the court may direct.

SEC. 7. That no delay in making an assessment of compensation, or in taking possession, shall be occasioned by any doubt which may arise as to the ownership of the property, or any part thereof, or as to the interests of the respective owners. In such cases the court shall require a deposit of the money allowed as compensation for the whole property or the part in dispute. In all cases as soon as the United States shall have paid the compensation assessed, or secured its payment by a deposit of money under the order of the court, possession of the property may be taken.

SEC. 8. That the Secretary of the Interior shall annually report to Congress, at the commencement of each session, a detailed statement of all the proceedings under the provisions of this act.

Mr. RANDALL. If there is a report accompanying this bill I call for its reading.

The following report (by Mr. SINGLETON) was read, in part:

The Committee on the Library, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1297) authorizing the construction of a building for the accommodation of the Congressional Library, submit the following report:

The condition of the Library of Congress in its present narrow, inconvenient, and totally inadequate quarters is such as to demand prompt action at the hands of Congress. The protection of valuable public property, and the necessities of Congress for the prompt service of its great collection of books, which can only find their highest utility when properly arranged and classified, alike require enlarged accommodations. The most casual visitor to the Library must admit that its present condition is deplorable. The Librarian reports that it contains shelf-room for less than 300,000 volumes in all, while the present collection considerably exceeds 500,000. The result is seen in books stowed rank behind rank, so that their titles are concealed instead of exhibited, in alcoves overflowing into every adjacent space and corridor, and in floors heaped high with books, pamphlets, musical compositions, and newspapers, from the ground floors of the Capitol to the attic. Besides this, nine dark and unventilated rooms in the crypts below the Capitol have been filled with books, until at length all further resources for storage are exhausted. Meanwhile the collections grow apace, every year adding what would be deemed in most places a large library to the existing accumulation. There is no room for readers or for the Librarian's assistants, nor is there a single quiet place where a member of Congress can pursue his researches uninterrupted. Out of the hundreds of periodicals received, none can be filed in proper order from absolute want of space. The upper outlying story of the Library, which is not fire-proof, is filled with combustible material, embracing the most valuable files of American and foreign journals, reaching back more than a century, and is in daily peril from fire, which if once started would inflict irreparable damage. The confusion is such as necessarily to consume much time in finding books, and only the long experience of the attendants enables them to produce them at all.

This state of things, if continued, must still more obstruct the administration of the Library and prove a serious hindrance to Congress in the proper discharge of its responsible duties. Whether the bill proposed by your committee furnishes the best means available to meet the emergency is a question which the committee propose briefly to consider.

The bill contemplates the erection of a separate fire-proof building for the Library, upon ground lying immediately east from the Capitol and contiguous thereto. Such a building, planned throughout for the purposes of a library, possesses some indisputable advantages over any other proposed method for enlarged library accommodations. Calculated in all its parts for the proper shelving and service of books, and for the requirements of the extensive and rapidly growing copyright business of the United States, such a separate building would embody superior security, accessibility, and practical convenience. The present Library has no reading-room worthy of the name; the Library building proposed in the bill would have a reading-room as large as the rotunda of the Capitol, from which the alcoves of books would radiate in all directions, thus reducing the waste of time and space in the library service to a minimum. By the use of numerous lifts or elevators, the different stories of the Library edifice would be brought into close and quick connection. By abundant skylights and spacious inner courts, as well as by the fact that the four exterior walls of the Library would be pierced with numerous windows, there would be secured the best lighted library building in the world. By the most improved interior ventilation system, an equable temperature could be secured in the upper and lower stories alike, while long experience has demonstrated that neither proper light nor wholesome ventilation are attainable in the Capitol building.

That a separate building to contain the overflowing stores of the Library of the Government is a necessity which can no longer be avoided or properly postponed appears evident to the committee from the considerations following:

First. The law of growth of this library (called by Mr. Jefferson in 1815 "the Library of the United States") requires for it greatly more space than is demanded by any other collection in the country. It alone is entitled to the deposit of books and other publications under the law of copyright. The well-known intellectual activity of the people has rendered and will render this source of acquisition increasingly large as the years roll on. The reports of the Librarian show that the entries of copyright have increased from 12,688 in 1871 to 25,274 in 1885. The number of copyright publications received annually averages over 40,000, which, although many of them are not books, require as much or more room for their preservation. This is exclusive of an annual growth of nearly 20,000 volumes from the various sources of purchase, donation, international and other exchanges, and deposits by the Smithsonian Institution in the Library. The collection, already numbering in 1886 543,441 volumes of books, besides 170,000 pamphlets, must soon reach a million. Like the great government libraries of Europe, which have long had the benefit of the copy tax, it holds and will maintain the highest rank in the country both in the extent and the value of its intellectual stores. Already it has reached a point where it can be said that there only five larger libraries in the world. These are the National Library of France, with 2,300,000 volumes; the Library of the British Museum, London, 1,500,000; the Imperial Public Library at St. Petersburg, 1,000,000; the Royal Library of Bavaria at Munich, 900,000, and the Royal Library of Germany at Berlin, 750,000. These great collections of literature are not only the pride and ornament of the countries which they represent—they are also of the highest utility to scholars and to the people. Through the stores of knowledge which they open to all comers, these national libraries stimulate and aid the creation of new works in literature and science, and contribute in a high degree to promote the public intelligence.

Second. The necessity of a separate building for the Library has been unanimously reported by five successive joint committees of Congress charged with the investigation of the subject since 1873, when it was first proposed. There has never been a dissenting voice or a report against it in these committees. Moreover, a special commission of experts, all of whom were architects, reported unanimously in 1880 that no enlargement of the Capitol could accommodate the Library even for a generation, but that a separate building was a necessity. These experts were Edward Clark, Architect of the Capitol, chairman; Mr. John L. Smithmeyer, of Washington, and Mr. Alexander Esty, of Boston.

The measurements of these architects, together with the figures of the steady growth of the collections reported by the Librarian, demonstrated that no possible enlargement of the Capitol which would be agreed to as feasible could possibly afford accommodation for more than a few years' increase, after which we should be confronted at last by the necessity of a separate building, after incurring all the cost of building on to the Capitol a costly annex of stone and iron, unfitted for any other purpose. Any enlargement of the Capitol which would accommodate the Library even as it stands, with room to arrange it, would cost much more than a separate building, because it must necessarily be constructed in the same costly style, with carved Corinthian architecture. Mr. Walker, the former Architect of the Capitol, estimated the cost of an extension of the west front at $4,500,000. The present Architect, Mr. Clark, estimates it to cost $4,200,000, while the plan of a building adopted by the committee is to cost only $2,323,600.

Third. In addition to the extensive and growing collection of books, this Library is made the permanent repository of all copyright publications of whatever character, many of which require for their proper storage and preservation even more room than volumes of books. These publications comprise engravings (both line and mezzotint), photographs, photogravures, lithographs, maps, chromos, prints, drawings, musical compositions, and periodicals of all descriptions. Among the many thousand specimens of graphic art which have accumulated in the Library during a few years' operation of the copyright law, and which now lie piled in heaps in dark places, from want of room in which to arrange or exhibit them, the Librarian reports that there are the materials for an extensive gallery of art, which would furnish a most instructive exhibit of the progress of the arts of design in America. This is impossible to be provided for within the Capitol; but the plan of a building adopted in the bill provides for an art gallery on the second floor, having the ample dimensions of 300 feet by 35, in which these collections can be arranged and utilized for the promotion of the public taste.

The large collection of maps in the Library, numbering about 9,000, now almost inaccessible, would be provided with a special hall where they could be arranged in geographical divisions, and made to contribute for the first time to the promotion of knowledge.

Several other methods of relief from the inconvenience and obstructions which beset the existing Library have been proposed, to avoid the construction of a separate building, and it is here proper for the committee to consider these in their order.

(1) It is proposed to enlarge the Capitol upon the western front by building a long series of rooms projected from the main building, and connected therewith by corridors at certain points. This plan contemplates practically a new building at a lower elevation than the Capitol. It would increase the existing difficulties of administration of the Library, by spreading it out into remote and widely separated apartments, greatly enhancing the time and labor required to produce books to a given center, and is moreover fraught with difficulties as to light and ventilation deemed by the committee to be formidable, if not insuperable. Another plan proposed has been an extension of the west front of the center of the building, of equal height with the Capitol, and uniform therewith; while still another plan proposes a great extension of the eastern central building, far in advance of the wings, so as to make the Capitol resemble in form a Greek cross. Either one of these plans would relieve the Library for a very few years at most, while their great cost (between four and five millions of dollars, as estimated by trustworthy architects), together with the fact that they would make a conglomerate pile out of what is now a purely classical building, furnish, in the judgment of the committee, conclusive objections to the adoption of either plan.

(2) The suggestion has been made that all that is needed is a cheap storehouse for the overflowing material of the Library; that the publications accumulated by copyright are mostly trash, useless for reading or reference, and should be stored or colonized in some other part of the city, leaving in the existing Library only the books which some unknown authority should assume to be of the most use and value. The Librarian, however, reports that experience has shown the necessity of having the entire collections kept together; that daily, and some times hourly, calls are made for books and other publications of every possible description acquired under the copyright laws, and that it is impossible to foresee at what moment those owning copyrights or interested therein may require to see any piece of literary or artistic property. Authors and publishers and their attorneys frequent the Library, and copyright publications, whether distributed as books with others of similar subject-matter, or stored in the copyright archives, must be produced at a moment's warning. The committee are therefore of the opinion that the proposition to divide up the Library collections, and to segregate or colonize large portions of them, would be an improper and most inconvenient arrangement. Congress is bound by its own legislation to protect and provide ample space for all copyright publications. They are a trust under the law, and can not properly be scattered any more than the models at the Patent Office, which are to be preserved as exhibits of the inventive art of the country, just as the books, engravings, &c., deposited in evidence of copyright, are exhibits of its intellectual activity.

(3) It has been proposed, and seriously urged in some quarters, to repeal the statutes by which the law of growth of this Library is fixed, to stop the further deposit of books and other copyright publications, and to confine the Library rigidly to the actual wants of Congress for use and reference. The committee can not concur in the expediency of this view, because the Government of the United States is too far committed by the legislation of Congress to the encouragement of literature and the fine arts through a system of copyright; because any supposed limitation which should fix the wants of the National Legislature for books and information by any arbitrary standard is fallacious and impossible; and because to arrest the progress of this great repository of learning (more than half of which has been gathered without expense to the tax-payers) would be a step backward. If, as has been well said by a great writer, the chief glory of a nation is its literature, any proposition to divide up or diminish the great Library already gathered, or to curtail its growth in the future, is unworthy of a nation claiming to hold a front rank in civilization.

It remains to consider briefly the plan for a Library building and the site proposed by the bill which has been adopted by your committee. It proposes a building of ample dimensions, to hold ultimately three million books, measuring 450 feet by 300, and covering about 2.9 acres of ground. The style of architecture is of the Italian renaissance order, carefully and economically adapted in all its parts to the purposes of a Government Library, and with interior arrangements approved by the Librarian. The building is designed to be of stone in the exterior and of iron and concrete in the interior, entirely fire-proof in all its parts. It is a pleasing and sufficiently ornate edifice, without extravagance, and will be entirely in harmony with the Capitol. That this proposed building is none too large for the destined wants of the collection is proven by a few figures which follow.

The area covered by the building of the British Museum is 5 acres; area of the National Library of France at Paris, 4½ acres; area of the Capitol building, 3½ acres; area of the proposed National Library, 2.9 acres.

The proposed building, as stated, will contain three million volumes, with suitable economy of storage. It is not designed to fit up the whole interior at once with iron shelving, but to introduce it gradually, finishing off the central portions, rotunda, and connecting rooms, and the entire exterior structure. The chief element of cost is in the iron alcoves of the interior, and in a building so extensive these may be finished in successive years, as wanted for the increase of books. The most carefully guarded estimates of cost contemplate an expenditure of only $500,000 the first year, about $1,000,000 the second, and $800,000 the third, which will complete the building for occupancy in all its parts, sufficient for shelving one million books, and leaving space for the gradual introduction of additional iron alcoves in the coming fifty years, the ultimate gross cost of which will not exceed $700,000, or an average of less than $14,000 a year. When it is considered that the copyright fees paid into the Treasury amount to over $20,000 a year, while the pecuniary value of copyright publications received annually is very much greater than this, the expenditure will appear moderate in comparison with the great resulting benefits and the national importance of the work.

As to the site provided for in the bill, the committee have given to the subject careful consideration, and have compared it with other proposed locations. They find that it combines the requisites of vicinity to the Capitol, salubrity, elevation of site, and desirable surroundings, to a greater degree than any other. It is perfectly level, requiring no expenditure for grading, or extra cost in preparing foundations. Its elevation makes the sight perfectly dry, which is a cardinal point in providing for a great national library to last for centuries. The proposed site is the nearest eligible ground to the Capitol that can be had. None of the squares north or south of the Capitol are at all suitable for a building so large and massive as the Library structure, being in a line with an architectural edifice of such magnitude, besides the serious objection that they are on a side hill, thus greatly increasing the cost of the building.

The committee have sought to ascertain whether it is not possible to secure a good location upon grounds already owned by the Government; and were any such site to be had, they would unhesitatingly recommend it in preference to a purchase of land. The late Commissioner (Colonel Rockwell) of Public Buildings and Grounds has testified before the committee in detail as to each and all the public reservations in Washington. He gives it as his judgment that there is no open space now in Government possession which is in itself suited to the location of a Library building, unless Congress is willing to destroy absolutely some one of the parks now open as breathing spaces and resorts for the people.

The proposal to locate the Library building on a Government reservation would send it to a place remote from the Capitol, inconvenient to members, and would destroy some open park now essential to the health and ventilation of the city; or else it would place it on low ground, totally unfit for a Government building intended for the preservation of books, which must be carefully kept out of reach of moisture.

In view of these facts, the committee see no proper course open, since ground must be had somewhere for a Library building, but to purchase the most eligible ground near the Capitol, if at a price deemed reasonable. The limitation in the bill, $550,000 for the three squares bounded by North B and East Capitol streets and by First and Second streets east, has been deemed a safe limit, just to the Government on the one hand and to the property-holders on the other. It embraces 226,137 square feet, to which is to be added about 270,000 square feet now occupied by the intersecting streets running through it, which would cost nothing, as they already belong to the public. The taxed valuation, six years ago, was about $360,000, and it is well known that taxed values in all the States and Territories are fixed far below market values. Comparing the cost of the land with what has been paid in other cities for Government buildings, we find that for the site of the post-office in Philadelphia we paid $1,491,201; at Chicago, $1,259,385; at Boston, $1,329,096; at Baltimore, $553,500, and at Cincinnati, $708,036. The bill provides a carefully guarded process of condemnation, if the space needed is not secured at a ratio of price deemed reasonable by the Secretary of the Interior.

Regarding the question of removal of the Library and the convenience of supplying books from its proposed site to the Capitol, the committee report that wherever it be located it is proposed to retain the existing central library-room, containing about seventy thousand volumes, such as experience has shown to be most needed as a library for daily use and reference. Any calls for authorities beyond these can be supplied from the main Library, through the use of the telephone, in from five to six minutes, or about the time now occupied by the pages in procuring books for members of the Senate or the House, respectively.

Additional force is given to the arguments for a new Library building in the fact that the removal of the Library from the two wings would vacate space which would give to the Senate and House from fifteen to twenty new committee-rooms, now so urgently needed; or the document and folding rooms, as well as the file-rooms of both Houses, might be removed to these wings, already fitted with iron fire-proof shelving, thus vacating for committee-rooms all the spaces occupied by these offices.

The committee unanimously recommend the passage of the bill herewith reported.

The CHAIRMAN (before the reading of the report was concluded). The hour assigned to this order of business has expired, and the Committee of the Whole, under the rule, will rise.

Mr. SINGLETON. I give notice that to-morrow I will undertake to explain the provisions of this bill.

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRISP reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 1297) authorizing the construction of a building for the accommodation of the Congressional Library, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. BURROWS. As the report of the committee was partially read in the Committee of the Whole, I ask unanimous consent that the whole report be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

Mr. SPRINGER. How much of the report remains unread?
The SPEAKER. About one page.
Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to know whether what has been read will be published in the RECORD under the rules.
The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks there is no rule on the subject.
Mr. SPRINGER. But this document having been read in open House——
The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that, according to the practice, so much as has been read would be published in the RECORD.
Mr. RANDALL. I do not think any of it should go in.
The SPEAKER. There is no rule of the House regulating the subject.
Mr. RANDALL. We frequently desire, of course, to hear these documents read as a matter of information; but there is no need that they should go into the RECORD.
Mr. BURROWS. I supposed that the portion actually read would go into the RECORD.
Mr. HISCOCK. I assume that it goes into the RECORD as a matter of course.
The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the practice has been to insert in the RECORD such reports as are actually read; but objection being made in this case, the Chair simply states that there is no rule of the House on the subject.
Mr. RANDALL. I see no occasion to cumber up the RECORD with documents which are already in print.
Mr. McMILLIN. I presume that the printed copies of this report are not exhausted, and the larger portion of the report having been read in the hearing of the House, it seems to me unnecessary that the document be published in the RECORD.
Mr. BURROWS. If so much as has been read goes into the RECORD, I can not see any objection to publishing also the small remaining portion.
Mr. McMILLIN. There is no objection to the publication if the portion which has been read goes into the RECORD; but the question is whether any portion of the document goes into the RECORD.
Mr. BURROWS. Let that be settled now.
The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know whether there has been any uniform practice on this subject. Occasionally, as gentlemen must have observed, reports read in the House are published in the RECORD; but sometimes they are not. There seems to be no uniform practice, and there is no absolute rule of the House upon the subject.
Mr. HISCOCK. There is no way to keep out of the RECORD what has been read; that much is published as a matter of course.
The SPEAKER. The bill itself has been read also.
Mr. McMILLIN. But it will not go into the RECORD.
Mr. HISCOCK. Is it not the practice to print bills which are read?
The SPEAKER. There is no conventional rule of the House on this subject.
Mr. BURROWS. Was not this report read in the time of the gentleman from Mississippi as a part of the debate?
The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that according to the better practice, reports, when read, are published in the RECORD; and it having been always held uniformly in the House that the reading of a report is in the nature of debate, the Chair thinks that on this principle a report read in the House would go into the RECORD, just as the debate would.
Mr. TAULBEE. I ask unanimous consent that the entire report be printed in the RECORD.
Mr. BURROWS. That has been already asked.
The SPEAKER. That has been asked and objected to.
Mr. RANDALL. If a portion of the report is to go into the RECORD, I do not object to publishing the whole.
The SPEAKER. Only one page of the report remains unread.
Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the question of printing this document in the RECORD be left to the decision of the Speaker.
The SPEAKER. The Chair has already indicated what he thinks the prevailing practice has been, and has also stated that inasmuch as the reading of a report is in the nature of debate, it would seem to follow that a report when read would go into the RECORD just as do remarks made by gentlemen on the floor.
Mr. BURROWS. Then I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] withdraws his objection, and this report will go into the RECORD.
The SPEAKER. It is so ordered.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PEEL. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 5543) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes.
The motion was agreed to.
The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. McMILLIN in the chair in the absence of Mr. TOWNSHEND, who had been granted a leave of absence for two weeks).
The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and resumes the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.
Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, when this bill was last before the committee a point of order was made to lines 1032, 1033, and 1034, as follows:

For annual allowance for Capt. R. H. Pratt, while in charge of said industrial school, $1,000.

The point of order was made at the time that that was new legislation.
Now, I desire to make this suggestion to the Chair, that when this bill was reported by the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs no point of order was reserved, and that no point of order having been reserved at that time, the bill having been placed on the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for consideration without any point of order having been reserved against any of its provisions, it is now too late to bring forward or urge any point of order against the lines indicated.
Mr. BLOUNT. Has the gentleman examined to verify whether any point of order has been reserved against the bill or not?
Mr. PERKINS. If there is any controversy in reference to the matter we will refer to the Journal.
Mr. RANDALL. I desire to say, independently of what the Journal may show, that I would not consent by any yielding to allow that the failure to reserve points of order against an appropriation bill, when it is reported for reference to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, would prevent any point of order being subsequently taken during the consideration and discussion of the bill and action on it by section or paragraph. I am frank to confess that I did contend for that principle in the Forty-fourth Congress, but subsequently, as Speaker of the House of Representatives, I gave the subject most thorough research, and I can not for one consent that, by any action or omission to act on the part of this House, any one of its membership can be deprived of the right to make a point of order against any portion of a general appropriation bill. I do not object to points of order being reserved, but I do say that if there should happen to be any failure to reserve points of order—if, in other words, points of order are not reserved, I hold there still remains in the hands of any individual member of this House, as the bill is considered, to make the point of order. That, Mr. Chairman, is in the direction of intelligent legislation. How in the world is any member of the House to know what is in a bill, or how can he have any degree of information upon which to make the point of order before the bill has been read to the House—before, in fact, it has been before the House for consideration and discussion?
Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?
Mr. RANDALL. Yes, sir.
Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to know whether it has not been uniformly held a failure to reserve points of order when a bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union does not act as a waiver?
Mr. WELLBORN. That I undertake to say has been the unbroken current of decisions in reference to this matter.
Mr. RANDALL. As I have already stated I so held myself in the Forty-fourth Congress, but after careful research I do not believe it is the right position to take, and I am able to stand up here and say I was wrong at that time.
Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to know how far the rulings have been in conformity with the idea that a failure to reserve points of order is equivalent to a waiver?
Mr. SPRINGER. Let me read from the Digest.
Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to know whether it has been uniformly held such failure to reserve points of order acted as a waiver?
Mr. RANDALL. I am not able to answer the gentleman's question with absolute certainty.
Mr. SPRINGER. I ask the Clerk to read from the Digest.
Mr. HISCOCK. I rise for the purpose of asking the gentleman in charge of this bill when it is that this provision of the rule is waived, if it can be waived?

Nor shall any provision changing existing law be in order in any general appropriation bill, or in any amendment thereto.

That is a positive affirmative declaration that new legislation shall not be in order. We waived the right to agree to it when we passed that provision of the rules of the House.
Mr. SPRINGER. I ask the Clerk to read from page 314 of the Digest.
The Clerk read as follows:

In the case of an appropriation reported by the Committee on Appropriations in conflict with Rule XXI, clause 3, and committed with the bill, it is not competent for the Committee of the Whole or its chairman to rule it out of order, because the House, having committed the bills (of course it is otherwise where the point was reserved before commitment), are presumed to have received, as in order, the report in its entirety. So far as proposed amendments are concerned, the current of decisions in Committees of the Whole has been to exclude not only all appropriations not previously authorized by law (with the exceptions contained in the rule), but also independent legislation; admitting, however, limitations and provisos as to appropriations which are themselves in order.

Mr. RANDALL. Now read the rule itself.

The Clerk read as follows:

3. No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriation for such public works and objects as are already in progress; nor shall any provision changing existing law be in order in any general appropriation bill or in any amendment thereto.

Mr. RANDALL. Now, the exceptions in the rule are stated; but nowhere will there be found any restriction as to the time or any indication of a period in the course of the consideration of the bill when it will not be in order to interpose the point of order; nor is there a period when that privilege is taken from any member of the House.

Mr. DINGLEY. I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to the fact that the new rule is much stronger upon that point than the old one.

Mr. WELLBORN. May I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question?

Mr. RANDALL. Let me say that I am not in opposition or antagonism to the bill of the committee. I am in favor of inserting the name of Captain Pratt, if it be deemed necessary; but I think this is a point of order that is too far-reaching to be passed over without having it clearly settled, so that the practice of the House may be determined in this regard.

Mr. WELLBORN. I want to ask the gentleman a parliamentary estion.

Mr. RANDALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. WELLBORN. Have you ever known a decision made here in the House that where the point of order was not reserved when the bill was reported it could be urged in Committee of the Whole? I appeal now to your recollection for an answer to that question.

Mr. RANDALL. The rule itself settles it. I have already stated that I was myself of the opinion once that such a practice should prevail. I repeat, at one period of my Congressional life I held differently; but whenever I discover myself in error my rule is to make haste to correct it. For that reason I think at this time the House should take a position touching this point so as to settle the question as to whether at any time, under the wording of that rule, a member is deprived of the privilege of making a point of order upon a proviso of an appropriation bill which he has then heard read perhaps for the first time.

Mr. WELLBORN. It is more important, sir, to preserve the practice of the House unbroken than it is to gain an advantage by any temporary expedient.

Mr. RANDALL. I am not seeking to gain any advantage.

Mr. WELLBORN. I understand that.

Mr. RANDALL. I am probably in harmony with the gentleman himself who has spoken in connection with this bill and mean to support the committee. But this question underlies every appropriation bill, and should have a determination either by the House or by the Committee of the Whole so as to settle it for all time.

Mr. WELLBORN. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will permit me, his argument is precisely what I have always held, that there should be a general rule of the House with reference to the reservation of points of order on bills sent to the Committee of the Whole. But we have not any such rule now, and I presume it will not be questioned that the practice has been that unless points of order are reserved when the bill is reported it is thereafter too late to make them in committee.

Mr. RANDALL. I think it is the rule now. I think that is the true spirit and meaning of the rule, and it is only evaded by construction. The language of the rule gives no warrant for the argument that any member of the House is deprived of the right at any time to make the point of order upon an item of an appropriation bill because he has not been able to make it prior to the immediate consideration of such paragraph; in other words, at the time of the introduction of the bill.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, believing that the new rule did not require points of order to be reserved on the introduction of these appropriation bills, when the first general appropriation bill was introduced at this session I raised that question in order to have a construction of the rule by the Speaker; but the Speaker at that time declined to make a decision for the reason that it was a question for the chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. My reason for raising the question was because of the fact that bills sometimes came in, and may come in, without attracting any special attention, and consequently the points of order would not be reserved. I believed then, as I believe now, that the rule runs against the bill not only at the moment of its introduction, but against it at every stage of its consideration; and necessarily so, or else the rule has no force except at the one moment, one period of time, at one point when the bill is first introduced, when you do not know what may be in the bill; that is, before it has been read at all, and before it can be known whether there is anything contained in it to which the objection may lie.

This is a new rule. There is no decision under it. It is not the old rule precisely; it is more restricted than the old rule, as has already been stated, and in my judgment, the point of order lies against the bill from its introduction, and without any reservation, until it has been disposed of finally. The bill, therefore, is liable to the point of order against every section of it, every item, in all of its paragraphs, and at every stage of its progress through the committee.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make this suggestion: We are now in Committee of the Whole by the order of the House for the consideration of this bill. If the point of order had been reserved in the House, then, under the rulings of the Chair and under the former decisions on the point of order, such reservation could properly have been brought to the attention of the Chair.

But the unbroken current of decisions is, that where the points of order are not reserved, and we being in Committee of the Whole by order of the House for the consideration of the bill, it is then too late to interpose and urge that objection. That is the principle upon which the rulings have been heretofore made, and it is in keeping with that line of precedents that the Chair has repeatedly—in the Forty-eighth and prior Congresses—held that new points of order could not be made against a bill under such circumstances. When the bill was reported to the House it was assigned to the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the point of order followed it there. Then, instead of permitting the consideration of obnoxious measures, the point of order was urged against it, having been reserved at the time it was reported. But, as has been suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania himself [Mr. RANDALL], he held when Speaker that could not be done unless the point of order had been reserved. So also with other Speakers, who uniformly held that under such circumstances it could not be done. The rule of this House, as has been suggested, is somewhat different, but the principle is the same.

While the language of the rule may be somewhat different, the principle involved is the same as is involved in former rules of former Congresses. For that reason I urge now, for the purpose cutting off this discussion, that the point of order can not be made at this time against this item, points of order not having been reserved when the bill was reported to the House.

Mr. STORM. I ask the Clerk to read the third clause of Rule XXIII.

The Clerk read as follows:

All motions or propositions involving a tax or charge upon the people; all proceedings touching appropriations of money, or bills making appropriations of money or property, or requiring such appropriation to be made, or authorizing payments out of appropriations already made, or releasing any liability to the United States for money or property, shall be first considered in a Committee of the Whole, and a point of order under this rule shall be good at any time before the consideration of a bill has commenced.

Mr. STORM. Now I submit that, notwithstanding what may be our views of what the rules ought to be, that is the rule, and until that rule is altered or abolished it remains the rule for the orderly government of this Committee of the Whole, and the prior rule, clause 3 of Rule XXI, does not militate against this, because that says certain things in the way of legislation shall not be permitted on an appropriation bill. This rule says if you wish to take advantage of any point that may lie against an appropriation bill you shall do it at a certain time and in a certain manner; that is to say, after the bill is reported, referred, and printed, and before you enter upon its consideration in the Committee of the Whole.

This bill was reported on the 11th day of February of this year and remained on the Calendar of the Whole House on the state of the Union for nearly a month before its consideration was commenced. Gentlemen had all that time to examine the bill and see if it was obnoxious to any provision of the third clause of Rule XXI. And when they have failed to do that, they have waived all rights to raise the question now, whatever may be the opinion of my learned colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], whose authority on disputed points of parliamentary law I would consider the highest; but I can not accept that authority when squarely against a rule of this House as to which there can be no doubt about its interpretation. To sustain the point of order raised by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. PEEL] will be to defeat all the humane provisions of this bill relating to Indian education, and I hope the committee will not sustain it.

Mr. SPRINGER. The rule read by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STORM], who has just taken his seat, does not apply to the present case. It applies only to the point that bills making appropriations, &c., must have their first consideration in a Committee of the Whole House, and it provides that the point of order, that they must have their first consideration in a Committee of the Whole House, must be made in time before the consideration of the bill is entered upon.

A MEMBER. In the House.

Mr. SPRINGER. In the House. So that it does not apply to the case now before the committee except so far as the analogy of parliamentary proceedings might make it apply. The rule, however, under which we are operating is that contained in clause 3 of Rule XXI, which provides, as has been read:

No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, &c.

Now, this rule is directed against the reporting of a proposition obnoxious to this rule. When was this bill reported? I see by the printed statement on its face that it was reported to the House on the 11th of February. That was the time when the rule should have been invoked, the time when it was reported, and the point made that it contained propositions obnoxious to the rule.

But gentlemen may say, "We did not know what was in the bill and could not know it until the bill was reached." That is very true, and for that very reason the uniform practice of this House, ever since I have been a member of it, has been that when appropriation bills were reported from the Appropriations Committee all points of order were then reserved. And when they have not been reserved the rulings of the chairman of the Committee of the Whole have been uniform, so far as I remember, to the effect that, points of order not having been reserved, could not be taken thereafter.

Mr. WELLBORN. Will the gentleman from Illinois allow me a question?

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. WELLBORN. I have given some little attention to this very question, and I want to ask the gentleman if there ever has been a conflicting decision, differing from what the gentleman has now stated, by any presiding officer of this House?

Mr. SPRINGER. Not that I know of.

Mr. MORRISON. With the consent of my colleague I will ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WELLBORN] whether the provision or clause of the bill on which the point of order has been made could as an original proposition go into the bill under the rule prohibiting legislation on appropriation bills, and would it not necessarily go out if the point of order was made in time? Does not the third clause of Rule XXI exclude it because it is an expenditure for Mr. Pratt, with no law authorizing it?

Mr. WELLBORN. No, sir.

Mr. MORRISON. Where can you find any law concerning him other than the appropriation to pay him $1,000 for his salary for the current year?

Mr. WELLBORN. I will say to the gentleman that the third clause of Rule XXI reads in this way—

No appropriation shall be reported in any appropriation bill for any expenditure not previously authorized by law.

Mr. MORRISON. Is that authorized by any law?

Mr. WELLBORN. The Carlisle school has been going on for four years.

Mr. MORRISON. Yes, and it may still go on; but there is no law appointing Mr. Pratt to the control of this school or fixing his salary at $1,000 per annum except for the current year, for which he is given in the last appropriation bill $1,000 per annum while in charge of the Carlisle school. If the law is that he is by it continued in charge of the school beyond the current year, then it also makes a permanent thousand-dollar appropriation for his salary while he is so continued, and this bill only proposes to do what is already done in the last.

Mr. WELLBORN. It has been in the bill for four years.

Mr. MORRISON. And you may put it in again, but not in accordance with the rule.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have not yet given up the floor.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman from Illinois allow me to ask him one question? I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois, without any regard to precedents or supposed precedents, to give the House a substantial reason why points of order should be reserved when a bill is introduced.

Mr. BLOUNT. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, in the light of this discussion, I wish to know if the question whether or not the failure to reserve the points of order when this bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole amounts to a waiver of the same is not to be passed upon by the Chair before the other question shall be considered at all.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, I understand the question before the Chair is whether this point of order was made in time, and to that I was addressing myself. The gentleman from Georgia wants to know——

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, I prefer to get my information from the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state, in response to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT], that when the committee rose on Thursday last the point of order had been made against the two lines in the bill that have been designated. The question had been discussed for a considerable time, and the Chair had stated that he was going to submit it to the committee for decision.

Then, as the present occupant of the chair now remembers, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] suggested that the point was so important, that the committee having to pass upon it should have further opportunity to consider it, and, as it was about time for the committee to rise, a motion to rise prevailed. The then occupant of the chair is absent from the House, and the present occupant states for the information of the gentleman from Georgia his understanding of the status of the question. The point is now made by the gentleman from Kansas that the point of order against the two lines in question was not made in time, points of order not having been reserved when the bill was reported to the House.

Mr. RANDALL. But the Chair will remember that the gentleman from Kansas now shifts the question by taking the position that it was in order because there was no point of order made when the bill was reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS] who makes this point of order states that he urges it as a reason why the point of order which the former occupant of the chair proposed to submit could not be sustained by the House.

Mr. SPRINGER. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to answer the question of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] as to what good reason there is for not permitting this point of order to be made at this time. We have adopted rules for the government of this House, and those rules should be observed. The reason for the rule is not always apparent, but if it is the rule we are bound to follow it. This rule provides that the Committee on Appropriations shall not report a bill containing provisions of a certain kind. When such matter is reported it is then in order to take exception to the report having been made. This bill was referred by the House to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of being considered as referred to that committee. We are simply one of the committees of the House.

The Committee of the Whole consists of all the members of the House, but it is not unlike, in other respects, any other standing committee of the House; and when the House refers any proposition to a committee for its consideration that committee is not at liberty to say to the House, "You have no right to refer this to us." For that very reason the points of order have always been referred when the bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole, so that when any objectionable provision was reached the committee should be bound by the fact that the points of order had been reserved. What I contend for is that the orderly disposition of business requires that we adhere to the precedents that have been made heretofore, and those precedents are uniformly to the effect that points of order upon an appropriation bill have always been made, and, to be effectual, ought to be made, when the bill is referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Chairman, if we are to consider this question by the analogy of the law, I think it clear that the position of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] is not maintained, and that the position of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] is fully sustained. The clause of Rule XXI which has been referred to provides that no appropriation shall be reported on any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto for any expenditure not previously authorized by law.

It is insisted that unless points of order are reserved upon a bill when it is referred they can not be made afterward. The analogy of the law would lead us to a different conclusion. The legal rule is, that that which has been forbidden by the law can not be done and can not be considered as having been done. If, therefore, an appropriation bill comes here containing clauses that are objectionable in this respect, and there is an omission to make a formal reservation of the point of order, whenever the House discovers that the rule in this respect has been violated it ought to be, and, in my judgment it is, the right and privilege of the House to correct the wrong. I can see no reason, either in fact or in the analogy of the law—and we have to construe the rules by the analogies of the law—I can see no reason why a mere arbitrary statement, founded on no reason and violative of the rules themselves, should override the plain intent of the rule, which is that no such provision shall be put into an appropriation bill reported to the House.

I can see no reason, and no man can conceive any reason, why when we discover that a rule of the House has been violated we have not the power to correct the violation.

It has been suggested that questions of this kind are very important in practice. They are so; and it is well we should determine them correctly. I hope the House will not undertake to bind itself by an arbitrary rule for which no just reason can be assigned in the face of and in opposition to all the rules of legal construction.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I have listened to the discussions on this point of order, and it strikes me as very strange that during the last three or four years, in each of which we have made appropriations for these Indian schools on the reservations and in the East, no point of order of this kind has ever been raised. We have had these appropriations recommended by the Committee on Appropriations each and every year when that committee had charge of the Indian appropriation bill. Yet, sir, you are now asked to decide upon this question of order that this Committee of the Whole is incompetent to consider appropriations of this character. I am strongly of the impression that this is an indirect way of striking down the appropriations which have heretofore been made for carrying on these schools, and which are again appropriated in this bill. Why, sir, there would be to-day no way of continuing these appropriations if they were now struck out upon a point of order, except by passing a general law providing that each year there shall be an appropriation for the continuance of these schools on the reservations and in the East. Mr. Chairman, you know very well and the members of this committee know very well that at this late day in the session it would be almost impossible to introduce such a bill and have it enacted into a law. Progress in enacting laws is, under the rules, when a session of Congress is so far advanced, exceedingly uncertain.

There is a law of humanity in regard to the Indian children which teaches every man in this House, and in this country, that there is something due to these efforts for their education and advancement in civilization; and whether you should decide this point yourself or submit it to the Committee of the Whole, I think there is reason to hesitate before we strike down these means of teaching Indian children, for whose education we have appropriated money without objection from any source, upon a point of order for the last four or five years, the results being so encouraging to their instructors. I feel, sir, that you would be justified, and this Committee of the Whole would be justified, in deciding that these appropriations should remain in the bill because we have without objection made similar appropriations from year to year and know the proper expenditure of the same and the improvement in the children. Yet in spite of this uniform practice we are asked now to strike them out upon a point of order instead of meeting the question face to face and voting them down if members believe them improper, or passing them if they are deemed meritorious, as I am sure those who have examined the subject thoroughly believe. I repeat, that in my view the attempt to strike out these appropriations on a point of order is an indirect way of striking at the schools, both those on the reservations and those in the East. I hope it will be decided that such appropriations are properly in the bill, and that they should be acted upon in this committee, receiving approval here and in the House.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, when the Committee of the Whole last had this bill under consideration the question, as has been stated by the Chair, was whether or not a certain amendment designating a particular person for a special duty was in order or should be ruled out because it would change existing law. Upon that question it seems to me there is no difficulty. I am clearly of opinion, as I have heretofore stated, that such a proposition in a bill of this kind must under ordinary circumstances be ruled out of order. But it has now been developed in this discussion that points of order were not reserved when this bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. My friend from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] interjects a suggestion that there is no rule of the House requiring points of order to be reserved. I do not agree with him on that question. The uniform practice of the House has been the other way. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], when asked what had been the practice, stated that he had not examined sufficiently to answer that question positively; and he does not base his opinion on the practice of the House.

I concede that it is very important to inquire how this rule has been construed heretofore. The present rule is not exactly the same as the former rule; but so far as regards the determination of this question it is practically the same. The old rule provided that there should be no legislation in a general appropriation bill except such as retrenched expenditures in one of three several ways, which are so familiar to the House that it is needless for me to repeat them. The rule is now modified so as to exclude legislation of any kind. This being the case, there is no reason to suppose that the change in the rule modifies the effect of the practice of the House upon the construction of this question. What has been the practice of the House on this subject? I hold in my hand the manual by which the House is guided in its discussions, "The Digest and Manual of the Rules and Practice of the House of Representatives," a book made up by order of the House and adopted by it for its guidance. I find in this volume a passage which has been read by my friend from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], but which may not have been apprehended, in the confusion, by every member. I will therefore read it again, from page 314:

> In the case of an appropriation reported by the Committee on Appropriations in conflict with Rule XXI, clause 3, and committed with the bill, it is not competent for the Committee of the Whole or its chairman to rule it out of order, because the House having committed the bill (of course it is otherwise where the point was reserved before the commitment), it is presumed to have committed, as in order, the report in its entirety.

Now this presumption has always obtained in reference to this matter. The practice, as stated in this compilation of the rules and practice of the House, has been uniform; and I venture to say that it is in harmony with the experience of every gentleman on this floor, no mathow long may have been his term of service. We are therefore at no loss what the practice has been or what the uniform construction has been in reference to this rule.

I regret very much this question has been raised in this way, for it now becomes complicated with another question. As to the first, I shall have no difficulty in sustaining the point of order, but on the matter as to what the practice of the House has been of reserving points of order I differ with those gentlemen with whom I agree on the first proposition. I trust the Chair will treat this not as a reason in support of the first, but that he will treat them as separate questions of order and pass upon them accordingly. If that be done, we can vote on each one of these questions without embarrassment as to the other.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, clause 3 of Rule XXI would clearly lie against the bill in all its proceedings, but clause 3 of Rule XXIII clearly restricts the application of clause 3, Rule XXI, in cases of bills of this kind. I concede, therefore, that the point of order is well taken.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will my friend allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does not my friend misapprehend that third clause of Rule XXIII? Does it not mean this, that when a bill of this class has been brought in and the consideration of it has commenced in the House, that then the point of order may not be made against it that it shall have first consideration in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I think not. I think clause 3 of Rule XXIII requires the point of order to be made before the consideration of the bill begins in the committee. It provides that the point of order may be made after it has been referred from the House to the committee, provided it is made before its consideration begins.

Mr. HOLMAN rose.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I concede, so far as I am concerned, Mr. Chairman, that the consideration of this question makes it apparent that the rule itself should be amended. It is wrong as it stands. The point of order ought to lie against the bill at every stage of its consideration.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I wish to ask this plain question: Is there any rule of the House which requires points of order to be reserved? We will all concede there is no such rule. That leaves us free to infer they have not violated a plain rule of the House. If, however, in the consideration of the bill the fact appears that they have violated a rule of the House which prohibits the insertion of new legislation, then it is the first time an objection can be made under the rule, because there is no rule requiring points of order to be reserved. That rests in the practice of the House.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. But clause 3 of Rule XXIII requires that a point of order shall be made before the consideration of the bill has commenced.

Mr. HOLMAN. If my friend from Ohio will examine the rule he will see that he misapprehends it.

Mr. MORRISON. Of course he does.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Bills involving a tax or making an appropriation it is provided shall have their first consideration in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. That is the rule—shall be first considered in the Committee of the Whole—and the point of order must be made under this rule before the consideration of the bill is commenced. That is to say, before it has been commenced in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HOLMAN. The rule of itself carries such bills to the committee anyway, and you could not prevent their going there by any point of order.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I think this rule has a broader bearing.

Mr. REAGAN. The practice is to call the previous question, and no opportunity is generally allowed for objection to be made.

Mr. RANDALL. I should like to ask the gentleman from Ohio whether the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union is not controlled by the rules of the House in every particular?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Of course.

Mr. RANDALL. Then how does it escape from the operation of the third clause of Rule XXI?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. By the restriction of clause 3 of Rule XXIII.

Mr. MORRISON. That is, whether it is to be considered in Committee of the Whole or not. It might be a disputed question whether it went there or not under the rule, but if you wish to dispute the right of its going there you have to make the point before it goes to the committee.

Mr. WELLBORN. For a century the ruling has been as the gentleman from Ohio has stated it, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania can not point to a single contradictory decision.

Mr. RANDALL. Every decision has been heretofore coupled with the declaration that if it were a new question it would have been decided by the preceding officers the other way.

Now, these rules did formerly permit legislation, in two or three degrees, to be placed on appropriation bills; but the rules have been amended. This rule under which we are now operating says that there shall be no legislation upon appropriation bills. Hence to that extent it is a change from the old rule. Now, I want to ask what court in Christendom, when it discovers that an error has been made in its proceedings, does not stop and take immediate steps to correct the error prior to coming to a final decision upon the question involved?

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I believe I have the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already recognized the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. WELLBORN. There is no court on earth, I want to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] has the floor.

Mr. WELLBORN. There is no court in Christendom that would undertake to legislate——

Mr. RANDALL. We are a court here, sitting in judgment upon this bill now before us.

Mr. WELLBORN. I say there is no court in Christendom——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will again state that the gentleman from Georgia has the floor. The Sergeant-at-Arms will see that order is preserved upon the floor of the House.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I want to say——

Mr. WELLBORN. I thought I had the floor. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas assumed the floor. The gentleman did have it, not by recognition of the Chair, however; although the Chair will be pleased to recognize him later.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I want to refer to one or two points which have been made, and I wish to premise the statement by saying that I shall speak without any regard to the merits of the pending proposition proposed to be stricken out and entirely free from any feeling in the matter either one way or the other. What I shall particularly address myself to is the question raised, that no point of order can be made against an item in an appropriation bill while under consideration in Committee of the Whole unless the points of order were reserved in terms at the time the bill was reported to the House from the standing committee.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I asked the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] to give one substantial reason why, at the time of reporting a bill to the House, the point of order should be reserved. The reply of the gentleman was to cite a precedent in the previous history of the House. I asked him distinctly, aside from precedents, either the one way or the other, to give a reason for the rule which he said existed. He failed to do so.

Mr. SPRINGER. I beg pardon of the gentleman. I thought I had done so.

Mr. CRISP. I beg the gentleman's pardon; he did not.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will state it again, if the gentleman will permit me.

Mr. CRISP. I understood what the gentleman cited from the Digest, that inasmuch as the House had committed to the Committee of the Whole this bill for consideration, therefore the committee must consider it without any regard to points of order that may be made against items of it. That seemed to be the proposition of the gentleman.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is not quite the statement. If the gentleman will permit me——

Mr. CRISP. Certainly.

Mr. SPRINGER. I said that inasmuch as the House had referred this bill in these terms to the committee for its consideration, the chairman of the committee had no right to suppress any part of the bill from the consideration of the committee as being out of order.

Mr. MORRISON. What can they do——

Mr. SPRINGER. They must consider it all.

Mr. MORRISON. Does not its consideration involve any incidental action that may be proper?

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes; but they must consider it on its merits, and not suppress it as being out of order.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I would be glad to recall the attention of the committee to the simple proposition before it. I care not for the purposes of this case what the precedents may be under the previous rules of the House. We are operating now under a new rule, one which is more imperative in its requirements upon the committees to abstain from legislation upon appropriation bills than has ever before existed in the House. Under that rule——

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. CRISP. Of course, if the gentleman wishes to interrupt me in the middle of a sentence.

Mr. PERKINS. I did not desire to do that; but I want to ask in this connection, if this rule, to which the gentleman now refers, changes the principle as to the time when the point of order is to be made?

Mr. CRISP. I was coming to that in a moment.

Operating under a rule which is more imperative than ever before against legislation on appropriation bills, you are asked now to decide a question for the first time under the new rule; and now what I want to invoke at your hands, and that of the House in the interest of all its members, is a ruling that will give every man in the House a chance to see and examine fully each bill before any reservations of points of order are required, and accord to each member of the House the privilege of making any point of order he may desire when the bill comes up for consideration. Now, this being the first time this question has been raised under the new rules, we are not bound by precedents, if there be precedents of this sort; and I respectfully submit to the Chair, as I would to any other presiding officer, or the presiding officer of any court, that where the advocates of a practice under the old rules seek to ingraft it by precedent upon the new rule, they should be required to give some good substantial reason for the practice; precedent alone should not suffice; and if there be now no necessity for the practice, then the rule ought to cease with the necessity for its existence. The rule says that no committee of the House shall incorporate legislation in a general appropriation bill. We have a right to presume, therefore, that the committees of the House will conform to the rule. They come here with a great volume of manuscript; nobody outside of the committee knows what is in it. The gentleman having it in charge says, "I am directed by the Committee on Indian Affairs, say, to report to the House the Indian appropriation bill." The Speaker orders it to go upon the Calendar and be printed. No man outside of the committee has seen it. No man outside the committee has had an opportunity of seeing it. It is not even printed for the use of the House until after it is reported.

Now the advocates of the old doctrine of reservation of points of order claim that just at the very moment that the gentleman presenting the bill says, "I report the bill," you must rise in your place and say you reserve all points of order. You do not know what is in the bill. You do not know whether points of order can be maintained against it. You have no right to presume, as respecters of the rules of the House, that the gentlemen of the committee have violated any rule. And yet the principle invoked is that you must rise in your place and respectfully say, "I reserve all points of order." If those magic words are uttered, then the committees of this House can be required to conform to its rules. If those words are omitted, then the rules of this House are not binding, and do not compel the committees to conform thereto. Out upon any such doctrine! In sticking to form we shall have lost the substance, and the express rule which was intended to prevent the vicious practice of legislating upon appropriation bills will be nullified by a practice which may have existed in the past, but for which no gentleman of the present seems to be able to give any satisfactory reason.

I yield to no man in my respect for regular system and order. I recognize the fact that there should be a time when questions of order should be considered as waived. I recognize the fact that the rule cited by my friend from Ohio [Mr. WARNER], and it is a good rule, should be observed. But I say to him in my judgment he entirely misconceives the purpose of that rule. That rule says, if the gentleman will allow me the remark in passing, that all bills that appropriate money shall have their first consideration in the Committee of the Whole; but the point of order that they must be so considered must be made before you enter upon the consideration thereof, and can not be made thereafter.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. CRISP. Yes, sir.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Is not the rule positive and explicit as to the first consideration of these bills in the Committee of the Whole?

Mr. CRISP. Yes, sir.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. And, according to what follows in that clause, the point of order, if not made before the consideration of a bill has commenced, is of no force at all?

Mr. CRISP. In the case before us it will be conceded by every gentleman upon the floor that there is nothing in the rules of the House which prescribes that this exception or reservation shall be made at the time the bill is reported. Every gentleman will agree to that.

Meeting, then, a new question, to be decided now for the first time under these rules, how will you decide it? Will you be bound by a precedent which seems to exist without any good reason, or will you establish a precedent founded on reason and common sense?

Mr. LONG. Will the gentleman permit me to make a suggestion in support of his argument?

Mr. CRISP. Yes, sir.

Mr. LONG. I suggest to the gentleman that when the House referred this bill to the Committee of the Whole they referred it subject to the rules and with all the rights that go to the committee under the rules.

Mr. CRISP. Undoubtedly. Now, just a word or two further, for I have already said more than I intended.

The advocates for the proposition that points of order must be reserved in the House at the time of reporting the bill, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], my colleague from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT], and others rested upon the idea that the House committed this bill to this committee for consideration and the committee must consider it as it was. I reply as the gentleman from Massachusetts has replied, they committed the bill to this committee for consideration under the rules of the House. The rules of the House provide that appropriation committees shall not do certain things, and there is no provision of the rules that fixes any time for the making of points of order, therefore they should be made when the bill is under consideration; the place to make them is always under the rules in the Committee of the Whole, because the bills have their first consideration there, and points of order should be made, if to be made at all, before debate is had on the merits of the paragraph or section objected to.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CRISP. Yes, sir.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Could the point of order be made under clause 3 of Rule XXIII until we are in Committee of the Whole ready to consider a bill of that class?

Mr. CRISP. Either the gentleman from Ohio misconceives that rule or I do. In my judgment that rule shows no light on the question the Chair is now to determine. The bill is committed to the Committee of the Whole under the rules of the House. They take it and consider it. As the bill is read the members of the House see for the first time what the provisions of the bill are. They have an opportunity as a clause is read or as a section is read to rise in their places and raise the point of order on that clause or that section, namely, "There is no existing law that sustains the appropriation," or whatever the point may be.

Now, I ask you as a reasonable, fair-minded man if it is not as plain that the members on the floor ought to have a right to object to provisions inserted in the bill by the Appropriations Committee as it is that the Appropriations Committee should have the right to object to an amendment proposed by a member on the floor? If any gentleman on the floor rises and offers an amendment, the gentleman in charge of the bill can object to it by raising a point of order or anybody else can make the objection. What good reason is there when the bill is under consideration that a member of the House can not raise a point of order against any of its provisions?

If the rule that there shall be no legislation on appropriation bills is founded in reason and justice and is a proper rule, then, Mr. Chairman, the rulings of the Chair and of the House on questions of order ought to be in the direction of preserving the right. Nothing should be taken by intendment against the right. Now, I submit, the rule, as I contend for it, is reasonable, is in the interest of the object sought to be obtained by the provision that legislation should not be had upon appropriation bills, is in the direction of preserving the rights of each member of the House, is in the direction of the intelligent conduct of the business of the House, requires no "vain thing," enables each member, as a paragraph or section is read, before it is debated on the merits, to raise any question of order upon it, enables the House to see that no committee violates its rules without its consent, and altogether leads in the direction of fair, open, careful, and considerate legislation; and I hope that is what we all want.

On the other question I have nothing to say. I only desired, as there is a new question raised, or rather a question raised for the first time under the new rule, to invoke at the hands of the chairman and the committee such a ruling as is founded on reason and justice, and as will advance rather than retard the interests of good legislation.

Mr. REED, of Maine, rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman who was in the chair when the committee rose last Thursday announced his purpose to submit this question to the committee, stating that because it was a new and grave question he thought the committee should be permitted to decide it. The Chair will not overrule his action in that regard, and has no desire to cramp or limit debate, but will abide whatever seems the will of the committee in that regard. The gentleman from Maine is recognized.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I desire for an instant to call the House back to the question that is really under discussion. It is not what I or any other gentleman wishes to do with this paragraph that is under discussion before the committee at present. The question before us is, What is the rule of parliamentary law applicable to this case? And in order to ascertain what the rule is it is absolutely necessary for us to resort to first principles. That has been forgotten, measurably, in the discussion. What is this Committee of the Whole? Although it is composed of every member of the House, nevertheless it is a committee of the House, a creature of the House, subject to the laws and to the dictation of the House. It must do business precisely as the House of Representatives declares that it must do business. The House of Representatives charges it with certain work, and, among other things, commits this appropriation bill to the Committee of the Whole for consideration.

The superior has ordered the inferior to do certain work, and that is to consider this bill as it stands. First, we have the reason, namely, that this bill has been committed to the committee as a whole; now, what have been the decisions on this question? What are the precedents? The decisions have been uniform, from the very establishment of the rule, that the committee had no right to question the judgment of its superior—the House—as to what it should consider. Consequently, if anybody felt that there was liable to be in a bill any provision which was contrary to the rules of the House, he reserved the points of order and gave notice upon the reference of the bill.

Gentlemen who have been here during the operation of the rules which existed prior to the Forty-sixth Congress know that it was the invariable habit, not when an appropriation bill was reported, but when it was referred to the Committee of the Whole, to reserve all points of order, and if no points of order were reserved, then it went into the Committee of the Whole not subject to rules like this under consideration. That was the invariable custom, sanctioned by decisions as sacred as those of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] in front of me. Has there been any change since in that regard? You say the rule has been made more strict. What difference does that make? Here was legislation, so to speak, on the part of the House of Representatives—legislation repeated, legislation reiterated, legislation that got to be the unquestioned custom of the House—that points of order must be reserved. Now, then, if new rules are made after such legislation, so to speak, of the House has taken place, it must be presumed that those new rules were established with reference to the previous decisions of the House, just as if a court of justice had repeatedly construed a law and the Legislature had re-enacted the law.

So far as the question of reserving points of order in the House is concerned, although we have repeatedly changed our rules, we have never taken any adverse notice of these repeated decisions of the House. What is the conclusion? Why, that those decisions remain the law of the House. They are founded upon the reason that the House has conferred upon the committee restricted powers. If our rules have not changed, it follows as a matter of course that when this bill was committed it was committed with full knowledge, we are bound to presume, of that law. It is not strange that, amid the confusion which resulted after the rules of the Forty-sixth Congress were adopted, there should have been some uncertainty about this matter; but when you get back to the grounds upon which the practice of the House is founded, when you get back to the precedents there can be but one decision upon this question as a matter of parliamentary law. It does not matter what we want; it may be that the rules ought to have been changed; I think they ought; I think the right to make points of order ought to be understood as being reserved. But that is not the question. The question is, what is to-day the parliamentary law of this House on this subject? And it seems to me that that is a question which can be very easily decided.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I wish to ask the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] whether clause 3 of Rule XXI does not go with the bill into the Committee of the Whole and does not prevent any amendment being made which changes existing law?

Mr. REED, of Maine. That is another affair.

Mr. PEEL. Mr. Chairman, when I first raised the point of order on last Thursday on this paragraph I had no thought that this question would be discussed so extensively as it has been. I made the point, resting it entirely upon the third clause of Rule XXI. After it had been discussed for some time, as the Chair has stated, the committee rose, leaving the question pending, and now when the committee resumes the consideration of this bill the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS] makes the point that my point of order was not taken in time—which I think is rather a confession and avoidance of the point of order raised by me on Thursday. But it now becomes necessary that the rules of the House shall be construed. I believe, sir, the universal rule of construction as applied to law—and the rules of the House I understand to be law of the House—is that the language must be construed so as to be consistent with the existing law, and to carry out the object intended; for a rule without a reason is simply no rule at all.

Now, what is the attitude of this question? It is insisted that when a general appropriation bill is reported to the House by the chairman or whoever may have charge of it on behalf of the committee to be placed upon the Calendar, that is the proper time to reserve points of order in regard to any legislative provisions which the bill may contain. Now, I am not prepared to controvert the parliamentary learning of gentlemen who have served on this floor much longer than I have, but what is the legal presumption that follows the announcement of a report of a bill from a committee to be referred for consideration to the Committee of the Whole? The presumption necessarily is that the appropriations in the bill are in conformity with law; for it is a common-law principle that the acts of officials are not to be presumed to have been done contrary to law. Then when a bill is reported to the House for consideration the presumption necessarily arises that it is presented in conformity with the law governing the discharge of the duties of the committee. Certainly it would look very ridiculous for any member, in the face of this presumption, to rise and announce, before the bill had ever been read from the desk, "I reserve points of order upon that bill without knowing what it is;" for it is certainly a legal presumption in regard to every report of a committee of this House that it is not presented in violation of existing law. It is clearly presumable that reports are made in conformity with law; and an objection made at that stage of the proceeding in violation of this presumption would be equivalent to saying to the gentleman reporting the bill, "I presume or believe you have violated the law in making this report."

When the motion is made that the House go into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering a general appropriation bill, that is the first time the House gets jurisdiction of the measure to consider it. When the House has resolved itself into Committee of the Whole the bill is then for the first time read at the desk by its proper custodian in this House, so that the members are then informed of what the measure contains. If it be found when different sections or paragraphs are reached that they are violative of a plain provision of law prohibitory in its character, to say it is then too late to make a point of order, that such points ought to have been reserved before the House took jurisdiction of the subject-matter, before the bill had ever been read from the desk by its legal custodian, would be, to say the least, inconsistent with all ordinary legal procedure. I hope, however, Mr. Chairman, that we may progress with this bill. It is important it should be disposed of to-day. It is the intention of the chairman of the committee having it in charge that this, if possible, should be done. I hope this question of order will be promptly disposed of. It is not very material to me what the decision may be.

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Chairman, before stating my opinion on this point, I desire to reply to what has been said about the effect of the change in our rules upon this question. There has been no change in the rules affecting this question. The only result of the changes which have been made has been to make it more difficult to put legislation upon appropriation bills. The old rule provided that legislation should not be included in general appropriation bills unless it came within certain designated classes. The present rule strikes out the exception; that is all. As to the manner in which bills are to be considered in the House, and as to the effect of commitment to the Committee of the Whole, there has been no change whatever.

Now, in order that we may get at the reason of this matter, let us consider how this bill gets to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. The old rule, I believe, was—and when I speak of the old rule I mean the ancient parliamentary practice—the old rule was that all points of order on a bill must be reserved upon the second reading of the bill, or be considered waived. Now, under the practice of the House, we dispense with the first and second readings of the bill; and the first and second readings being waived, when a bill is reported to the House the question is, what shall be done with it? The rules require that bills of this character be committed to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

When the Speaker announces that fact it is accompanied with the other pregnant announcement, "This bill is read the second time." And then the question tacitly addressed to every member is "Are there any points of order to be reserved?" And if there be no point of order made, by unanimous consent points of order are waived. That is the reason of the rule. Suppose a gentleman to get up and say, "I have in this bill a dozen things which are contrary to rules, and I propose to pass them by unanimous consent," and the Speaker calls for objection, and none should be made, could a point of order be made afterward? No; because unanimous consent has been given by silence. So, when this bill was reported to the House, and the question was, "What shall be done with it?" the Speaker said, "Under the rules it must be committed to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union." Its first and second reading were then waived, and, no point of order being reserved, all points of order were necessarily waived.

Now, I care nothing about this proposition.

Mr. RANDALL. Let me ask the gentleman from Georgia a question?

Mr. HAMMOND. Certainly.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to know whether a committee of this House can make a report in violation of the rules of the House without the House having opportunity, when it discovers that fact, to provide the remedy?

Mr. HAMMOND. That depends on what the rule is.

Mr. RANDALL. The rule says there shall be no new legislation.

Mr. HAMMOND. You say that is one of the rules of the House?

Mr. RANDALL. So it is; and yet it is contended a committee of this House may come in with a bill containing provisions of new legislation. I maintain that whenever that fact is discovered the House has its remedy; that when a committee of this House has violated the rule it can not take advantage of its own wrong.

Mr. HAMMOND. I answer the gentleman with great ease to myself, although it may not be with satisfaction to the committee. Suppose on this bill you propose now to put a piece of independent legislation.

Mr. RANDALL. That would be an amendment.

Mr. HAMMOND. And nobody raises the point of order on it. You were at your lunch——

Mr. RANDALL rose.

Mr. HAMMOND. Let me get throngh with my answer. You were at lunch and nobody raised the point of order; you come in and say I propose to prevent the rules of the House being violated.

Mr. RANDALL. I will tell you the difference between the two.

Mr. HAMMOND. That is a case where you undertake to do a thing which could not have been done if any man had objected. The same rule which says such an amendment shall not be put on also says that the committee shall not report new legislation.

Mr. RANDALL. I will tell you the difference. In the case you refer to the amendment is read to the House, whereas the bill when committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union is not read.

Mr. HAMMOND. Any member can demand its reading. And the very fact, Mr. Chairman, that they are not read, so far from being an advantage to that side of the argument, is an advantage to this side, for it is a notice to every man in the House that the bill may have something objectionable in it. And, if you desire, now is the time to raise the point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. HAMMOND. Certainly.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman has stated correctly that prior to the present rule some legislation was permissible on appropriation bills clear back as far as we can get. Now for the first time there is an imperative rule that there shall be no legislation on an appropriation bill. The gentleman stated correctly that under the old system the point of order was made on the second reading of the bill. As late as the Thirty-seventh Congress it was agreed by unanimous consent that points of order might be reserved. Legislation became allowable. The only question was, was it legislation within the rules? It was entirely respectful to a committee for a member to reserve points of order because he had reason to suppose there was legislation on the bill.

But here is a rule which forbids new legislation on a bill. The committee is absolutely prohibited from putting legislation on a bill. Is it my friend's duty to assume that a committee having charge of an appropriation bill has violated the rules of the House by placing legislation on an appropriation bill in defiance of the imperative language of the rule? I admit two or three instances have occurred where gentlemen have felt themselves authorized to take the floor and reserve points of order; but, sir, it was a duty which ought not to have been thrown upon any member of this House. It is assuming that one of the committees of this House has been guilty of deliberate violations of the rules of the House.

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Chairman, I wish to restate, by reading the old rule, what I stated before, that in this regard the change of the rule affects nothing at all. The old rule is in the following language:

Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States, by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States, or by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill.

Now, suppose they brought in under the old rule a bill containing a provision that did change existing law, but did not reduce expenditures or do any one of the other things mentioned in this case, then the argument would have been exactly the same for excluding that under the point of order as the argument now being made for excluding this provision under the point of order. There was no change made in that regard in the rules at all, none whatever; and at length it remains just the same as before as to everything else. Here are the rules of the House; but at any time we may dispense with them by unanimous consent, or at any time we can override the rules of the House, when recognized by the Speaker, for the purpose of submitting a motion which may be carried by a two-thirds vote. And so it has been always held, without a particle of variance or shadow of turning, that when a bill is considered as read the second time all objections are waived which were then not expressly reserved by a general exception when the bill was reported.

Mr. HOLMAN. Now, will the gentleman from Georgia allow me? Does he meet the question as fairly as he usually meets the discussion of questions in the House? Was not the trouble under the old system prior to the present rule, and the justification on the part of members for reserving the point of order, that it was sometimes difficult to tell whether or not the provisions of a bill retrenched expenditures or not? Therefore——

Mr. HAMMOND. Let me answer right there.

Mr. HOLMAN. Just a word further. Therefore I say a member might well say, "I will reserve the point of order; I will bring the question before the Committee of the Whole to see whether there is anything in it that is subject to the point of order." While now, inasmuch as the rule of the House is imperative upon its committees, you are not to suppose that the rule will be disregarded in the preparation of these bills.

Mr. HAMMOND. In answer to the gentleman from Indiana it is sufficient to say that this very debate has shown it is now a question whether this is new legislation or not. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. WELLBORN] in charge of the bill insisted that it was not new legislation; that there was an existing law under which the appropriation could be made. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] this morning took the ground that because this school has been kept up for a series of years by this kind of appropriation it was not new legislation. May not gentlemen just as well differ under this as under the old rule? That argument, therefore, amounts to nothing, because the situation is exactly the same under the present rule as it was under the old rule for the purpose of this question. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to submit the question to the committee.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] who was occupying the chair when the committee rose last Thursday evening announced that the question would be submitted to the committee, and the present occupant of the chair does not feel that he would be justified in reversing that action.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask the indulgence of the Chair a moment. I wish to ask unanimous consent that the Chair may submit the two questions to the committee, the first being the last question that has been debated.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was about to make a suggestion which will probably cover the case.

The Chair will state that the first point of order is the one made by the gentleman from Arkansas against the lines beginning at line 1032:

For annual allowance to Capt. R. H. Pratt while in charge of said Indian industrial schools.

The point being made that it changes existing law, and hence is obnoxious to the rule. That was discussed during the last sitting of the committee on Thursday last, and no conclusion was reached. The chairman of the committee then announced that he would submit the question of order to the committee, and was ready to do so, whereupon the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] moved that the committee rise, in order that the members might consider it more deliberately and act upon it at the next sitting of the committee.

To-day the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS] makes the additional point of order that the objection made by the gentleman from Arkansas comes too late and can not be sustained, for the reason that the rule of the House provides that points of order must be made against provisions of this kind by reserving them upon the bill when it is reported to the House, which was not done when this bill was reported. If the point of order made by the gentleman from Kansas be sustained it will necessarily also end the importance of the point of order of the gentleman from Arkansas. It becomes, therefore, of equal importance to the original question, and the Chair will submit the two to the House to determine the points raised.

Mr. LONG. Will the Chair permit an inquiry?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Mr. LONG. Should not the second point of order be decided first?

The CHAIRMAN. That is the order in which the Chair proposes to submit them, for the reason that if the point of order made by the gentleman from Kansas is sustained it will settle both.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask the chairman to put the questions separately, because the point of order made by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. PEEL] involves the principle whether a provision of law in a former appropriation bill is a warrant on which a subsequent bill may be framed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state, in response to the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that it was the purpose of the Chair to put to the committee the question first on the point of order made by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS], because of the fact that if that point of order is sustained it necessarily defeats the other point of order.

Mr. RANDALL. Defeats it but does not make a decision upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. And for the further reason stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that the first point of order involves the question whether a provision made in an appropriation bill heretofore not existing in the general law is "law" in contemplation of the rule on which an appropriation bill can be sustained that continues the appropriation.

Mr. RANDALL. If the Chair will permit me, I want to say in reply that, a decision sustaining the point made by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS] only defeats the consideration of the other point made by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. PEEL].

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. And does not settle that question.

Mr. RANDALL. And does not settle that question as to whether an appropriation bill of last year is warrant for legislation on an appropriation bill of this year.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that would be the effect of it and the only effect. The question is, Shall the point of order made by the gentleman from Kansas be sustained?

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 66, noes 78.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I call for tellers.

Mr. PERKINS. I make the point that a quorum has not voted.

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum not having voted, the Chair will order tellers, and appoints the gentleman from Kansas, Mr. PERKINS, and the gentleman from Arkansas, Mr. PEEL.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 75, noes 91.

So the point of order was not sustained.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois, addressed the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I understand the point of order made by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. PEEL] now comes before the committee. I would like to make some remarks on that point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now pending on that point of order. The Chair stated he would submit both questions to the committee. But the Chair has no desire to cut off the gentleman if it is the will of the committee to hear him.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I would remind the committee that all day we have been discussing this point of order as to the time when a point of order should be reserved, and it seems to me I might perhaps be allowed three minutes to consider the point of order which it now seems we have to decide.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair having announced his purpose to submit the question to the House, can now only allow debate by unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS] shall be allowed three minutes?

There was no objection.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I heard it suggested yesterday by one or two gentlemen familiar with the rules that this particular paragraph was obnoxious to the new rules. I submit that since the first part of clause 3 of Rule XXI has application to the character of appropriations which may be placed in appropriation bills, and the last portion of it applies only to changes of existing law other than appropriations, the last part of the clause does not apply to this provision now under consideration. If obnoxious to any point of order at all it must be obnoxious to the first part of that clause.

It was also said that the decision turned on the question whether this appropriation was authorized by existing law. I wish to submit to the committee that under that rule you may have an appropriation that is not authorized by existing law, provided it is in continuation of a public work that has already been appropriated for.

I do not desire to detain a weary House except to suggest to gentlemen that the question is not whether this is a change of existing law, and the question is not whether this is an appropriation for a purpose not authorized by law, but it is simply the question whether it is for a work or object now in progress.

Mr. RANDALL. The issue in this point of order is simply this to my mind. We have changed the rules. We have said there shall be no legislation on appropriation bills. Now the proposition would seem to be, by what I might call the latitudinarian construction, that you can make a past appropriation bill a warrant as against this rule just made for legislation on a like subject in a new appropriation bill. The safer side, and I think the logical view of the question, is that legislation shall not now under the new rule be allowed on an appropriation bill because it happened to be permitted on a former appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the point of order made by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. PEEL].

Mr. PERKINS. The chairman of our committee, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WELLBORN], would like to call the attention of the committee to the rule which I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania has forgotten, which says that no appropriation shall be reported for any expenditure not previously authorized by law unless in continuation of existing appropriations.

Mr. RANDALL. If it comes under that rule, that is another thing.

Mr. MORRISON. But there is no law authorizing such an appropriation.

Mr. WELLBORN. The Carlisle school has been appropriated for. You will find the authority for this in every appropriation bill for the last four years.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. And if not previously authorized, it could come in under that rule.

Mr. STORM. I desire to have read the act of Congress which originated the introduction of this man's name in the bill, so as to show the authority of law for inserting it. I desire this to be read to show to the House that this appropriation, with the name of R. H. Pratt as it appears in this bill, is already provided for by existing law.

Mr. LONG. Mr. Chairman, while we are waiting for the reading of that, I would like to suggest that this allowance to Captain Pratt is a permanent allowance. It does not depend upon the appropriation for any single year, because the language is "for annual allowance to Capt. R. H. Pratt while in charge of said Indian industrial school." That is the language of the statute. The object of that law is the maintenance of that school. That is an object which is not only in progress now but has been in progress for the last four or five years, and the allowance being an annual one it is of a permanent character, so that this provision does not make any change of existing law.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Chairman, this is not an appointing body, and we can not make the violation of law at one session a reason for continuing to violate it at another session.

Mr. STORM. Mr. Chairman, I want the House to understand that in the existing law the same provision which provides for the payment of a thousand dollars a year for this purpose provides for the insertion of Captain Pratt's name. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. PEEL], I know, wishes to strike out the name of Captain Pratt, but to keep in the appropriation of the $1,000; but if gentlemen will hear the original act read they will find that Captain Pratt's name is not simply used for that year, but that provision is made for this permanent allowance to him as long as he continues superintendent of the school. If gentlemen will look at this bill as reported from the committee, they will find that its language provides this allowance for Captain Pratt "while" he is superintendent of said school. The original act, upon which we base the right to insert his name in the pending bill, is what I have sent to the Clerk's desk, and I ask that it be now read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support of the Indian Industrial School at Carlisle, Pa., for transportation of Indian pupils to and from said school, $80,000; and said sum shall be disbursed upon the basis of an allowance not exceeding $175, exclusive of transportation, for the support and education of each pupil actually maintained in, and support and education at said school; but actual cost of transportation and other expenses of such pupils as are sent out of said school among farmers for support and education may be disbursed from said funds; for annual allowance to Capt. R. H. Pratt, in charge of said Indian industrial school, $1,000; in all $81,000.

Mr. STORM. Mr. Chairman, if the name of Captain Pratt is struck out of this bill, then to be consistent we must strike out the appropriation of $1,000, if the point of order is made against it.

Mr. PEEL. Mr. Chairman, the point of order does not have anything to do with the allowance. The point of order is directed to the provision creating an office, making this gentleman the superintendent of the school, and providing that nobody else can receive the salary. The point of order is directed to this new legislation creating an officer by name who is not an officer under existing law save by the annual appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the point of order made by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. PEEL] against the paragraph designated.

Mr. LORE. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LORE. I desire to know to what language in this bill the point of order applies—the specific words?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For annual allowance to Captain R. H. Pratt, while in charge of said Indian industrial school, $1,000.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, if you will turn to the record of the proceedings in which the point of order was made, you will find that it does not embrace the whole of those two lines, but is confined to the name of Mr. Pratt.

The CHAIRMAN. The present occupant of the chair was not in the chair when the point of order was made, but has been informed by the Clerk at the desk that the point was made upon the provision in the bill just read.

Mr. PERKINS. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. PEEL] says that I am right about it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the point of order made by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. PEEL] be sustained?

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. PERKINS. I rise to suggest that it would be well that the controversy or misunderstanding as to the exact bearing of the point of order should be settled before the question is taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk informs the Chair that the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. PEEL] made the point upon the paragraph just read.

Mr. PEEL. That is a mistake, Mr. Chairman; the RECORD does not so show.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read from the RECORD what took place, and that will determine the question.

Mr. PEEL. I was asked if I made the point of order upon the whole paragraph, and I replied that I did not, but only upon the insertion of this name.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Arkansas ought to be allowed to state his own point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. PEEL. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that paragraph, that it contains new legislation. It provides for an officer, the superintendent of the school, as well as providing his salary. The office does not exist by law otherwise than in the appropriation bill of last year, which will expire on the 30th of June at the time when this bill will take effect.

Mr. RANDALL. I will inquire of the gentleman whether he applies his point of order to the entire paragraph, or only to the part in which Captain Pratt is mentioned by name?

Mr. PEEL. I apply it, Mr. Chairman, not so much to the provision for the salary as to specifying this officer by name—not that I have any objection, &c.

The question being taken on sustaining the point of order, there were—ayes 93, noes 68.

So the point of order was sustained.

Mr. SPRINGER. I now move to insert the following in lieu of the words stricken out upon the question of order:

For annual allowance to the superintendent in charge of said Indian industrial school, $1,000.

Mr. PEEL. That is right. Nobody objects to that.

Mr. NELSON. I raise upon this amendment and upon the clause, if it is still in the bill, the same point of order which has just been sustained by the Committee of the Whole. I will say in this connection that I intend to make the same point of order against every other educational item in the bill, for they all stand upon precisely the same footing. My justification in this course, Mr. Chairman, is that a member of the committee reporting this bill has set the precedent of raising a point of order against the work of the committee, and that point has been sustained. This precedent having been set, I, as another member of the committee, will take the liberty of raising the point again.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think my amendment was misunderstood——

Mr. NELSON. There is no occasion for discussion. The matter has been discussed, and the Committee of the Whole has sustained the point of order.

Mr. SPRINGER. I wish to remove the impression——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. SPRINGER. No, sir; I want to withdraw my amendment, and submit it in another shape so as to avoid the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would be compelled under the ruling just made by the Committee of the Whole to sustain the point of order.

Mr. SPRINGER. I withdraw the amendment I just offered, and submit it in this form: Add the words, "for allowance——

Mr. NELSON. I want the question first settled whether that clause is in the bill or not. I wish to know whether simply Captain Pratt's name was stricken out or whether the whole of the appropriation was stricken out.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to amend——

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] rise?

Mr. NELSON. To ask a parliamentary question. I desire to know whether the clause providing for an annual allowance of $1,000 for somebody is still in the bill. Is the whole clause out or only the name of Captain Pratt?

Mr. PEEL. The allowance of $1,000 is in.

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not so understand.

Mr. NELSON. Then I make a point of order against the allowance.

Mr. SPRINGER. In order that we may understand just where we are, I wish the Chair would state what is in the bill now and what was taken out by the vote on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read to the committee the clause as it will stand if simply the name be left out. The Chair thinks the committee will see that if only the name be stricken out the clause will be left in a very awkward shape.

The Clerk read as follows:

For annual allowance to —— while in charge of said Indian industrial school, $1,000.

Mr. NELSON. Against that clause I make my point of order—the same point just decided by the Committee of the Whole. I ask the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. SPRINGER. I want to make a motion which will give sense to the clause.

Mr. NELSON. The motion is not in in order. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair begs the gentleman from Illinois to remember that this clause is not subject to amendment pending the point of order. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] has made the point of order that the allowance of $1,000 in the pending clause changes existing law, and in conformity with the decision just made by the Committee of the Whole the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. SPRINGER. How much does the Chair rule out?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules out the appropriation—the clause which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For annual allowance to —— while in charge of said Indian industrial school, $1,000.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is all out?

The CHAIRMAN. That is out.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to amend by inserting the following:

For annual allowance to the superintendent of said Indian industrial school, $1,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will send up his amendment in writing.

Mr. NELSON. I make a point of order against the amendment; there is no need for the gentleman to write it out.

The Clerk read the amendment as submitted by Mr. SPRINGER.

The CHAIRMAN. Against this amendment the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] makes the point of order that it changes existing law.

Mr. NELSON. And provides an appropriation for an officer not created by law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee of the Whole having just sustained this point of order in a little different form, the Chair feels constrained to conform to that action, and decides the point of order well taken.

Mr. SPRINGER. I want it understood that the Committee of the Whole voted simply upon the point of order in relation to Captain Pratt.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will continue the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support of Indian industrial school at Salem, Oreg.: Two hundred Indian pupils, at $175 per annum each, $35,000; pay of superintendent, $1,500; completion of school building and necessary outbuildings, and repairs and fencing, $5,000; in all, $40,000.

Mr. NELSON. I make the same point of order against this entire paragraph. It stands—and I speak advisedly—on precisely the same footing as the item which the Committee of the Whole struck out in reference to Captain Pratt. There is no existing law for this object—nothing but the last appropriation bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to a question of order. I desire to have read the clause upon which this point of order is made.

The clause was again read.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs whether this school has been authorized by law heretofore?

Mr. PERKINS. I do not see the chairman of the committee present, but I understand this school has been built by appropriations contained in appropriation bills and that it has been under the supervision of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. It has been constructed under appropriations for educational purposes.

Mr. SPRINGER. Is there a school-house there?

Mr. CUTCHEON. There is a school-house there.

Mr. PERKINS. Yes, there is a school-house there, and the school has been instituted and been carried on in consequence of appropriations made by the Committee on Appropriations for Indian educational purposes.

Mr. BLOUNT. It does not seem to me the point of order rests against this appropriation. Let me call the attention to Rule XXI, clause 3:

3. No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriation for such public works and objects as are already in progress.

Now it is admitted the Government has undertaken to educate these Indian children. They have had for years these schools. The Government has been expending money upon them. These persons have been paid for discharging this duty. It is unquestionably the object on the part of the Government to take care of these Indians in these schools for the purpose of educating them, and so reacting on their tribe. The question of legislation is not involved at all. The very fact excludes it.

In regard to a particular fortification, if you seek the statute under which it has been constructed you will find there is no statute on the subject. It has been constructed by appropriations in appropriation bills. It is an object of public defense to provide for building fortifications. It is likewise an object dear to the country and regarded for years as the true public policy to educate Indian children at these schools. I trust therefore we will not so far strain this rule as to make it absurd by striking down every public object which may be conceived because you can not find the special law for it.

Mr. WELLBORN. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MCMILLIN reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5543) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. BURNES. I submit the following privileged report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On amendments numbered 6 and 7: It is recommended that the House recede from its disagreement, leaving in the bill the following items:

JAMES N. BURNES,
LOUIS E. MCCOMAS,

Mr. BURNES moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a supplemental report of the surveyor-general for New Mexico on the alleged private land grant designated as Cañon de Pedernales grant; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Postmaster-General, transmitting certain information in reply to a Senate resolution of the 23d instant making inquiry as to a former resolution of March 4, 1886, calling for information as to the removal of fourth-class postmasters; which was read.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest that the communication lie on the table until the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS], who offered the resolution, comes in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made if there be no objection.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair presents a petition signed by 800 citizens of California, addressed to the President of the United States, and to the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled, setting out that they feel greatly aggrieved by the outrages recently committed in various places against unoffending persons, in contravention of law and treaty stipulations and right, at Rock Springs and other places, belonging to the Chinese population, and they pray for relief and indemnity. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and, as it is brief, if there be no objection it will be printed in the RECORD. [A pause.] The Chair hears no objection, and it will be so printed.

The petition is as follows:

To the President of the United States and to the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

The undersigned, residents and citizens of the State of California and of the Pacific coast, irrespective of political alliance, feeling aggrieved by the outrages recently committed in sundry places on the coast against unoffending residents in contravention of law and treaty stipulation, as well as of kindness, hospitality, and right, in that in Rock Springs, Eureka, Tacoma, Seattle, and many other places, parties claiming to represent the universal sentiment on the coast, have, by threats and violence, driven from their several communities the whole Chinese population without distinction of age, sex, occupation, or character, do hereby submit this our protest and memorial, and beg, therefore, the consideration which the enormity of the offenses committed and the importance of the subject-matter presented demand.

Purposely omitting any discussion of the act restricting Chinese immigration, or of the manner in which it has been executed by the constituted authorities—

We submit, first, that the perpetrators of these outrages do not represent the better part of the population of this coast, and it is slander for them to claim that public sentiment justifies or approves any such violence, or any such unjust and unlawful ejectment by threats and intimidation as have been used in the late riotous proceedings in sundry towns in this and other States and Territories.

We submit, second, that these threats and intimidations and riotous and bloody acts, committed under the light of the nineteenth century civilization, in this nation which claims to be a leading nation in intelligence, morality, and culture, shock our sense of national pride as well as our sense of justice, honor, and right. The Scripture injunction in regard to the "stranger sojourning among us" has been sanctioned and reasserted by all modern civilization, and to us it is abhorrent that in the name of public sentiment such violations of the laws of hospitality and humanity, to say nothing of right and plighted national treaty obligations, should be repeated in one community after another on our coast.

We submit, third, that such attempts to violently drive out residents of any one nationality who have acquired a constitutional and legal right to reside in the United States is in violation of the fundamental principle on which our Government was founded by our fathers. One of the principles deep down in their hearts was that this nation should be a refuge for the oppressed of every land. Shall it become instead a land of oppression, persecution, and cruelty?

We submit, fourth, that the Chinese residing in this country up to the time of the passage of the Chinese restriction act have as good a constitutional right to be here as any foreign-born resident in the United States.

The treaty between the United States and the Emperor of China, commonly known as the Burlingame treaty, expressly guarantees to the Chinese the same privileges as to residence and trade as are granted to the citizens of the "most favored nation," and the treaty of 1880 expressly continues these privileges to those Chinese in the country at the time the treaty was signed. The Constitution of the United States expressly states that the Constitution and the treaties formed under it shall constitute the supreme law of the land. The treaties formed under the Constitution are no less a part of the supreme law of the land than the Constitution itself. We note with peculiar and grateful gratification the language used in the last message to Congress, in which the President recognizes the binding obligations of the treaty and urges that "all the power of this Government should be exerted to maintain the amplest good faith toward China, in the treatment of these men, and the inflexible sternness of the law in bringing the wrongdoers to justice should be insisted upon."

We submit, fifth, that the communities where these riotous acts occur render themselves liable, according to law, for damages to life, property, and business injured or destroyed in such riots. Besides, therefore, the mortification and outraged sense of humanity, innocent citizens are by these lawless proceedings in danger of being heavily taxed to pay the damages the injured Chinese may lawfully and righteously demand.

We submit, sixth, that such high-handed, riotous, and murderous proceedings, if not promptly checked and summarily punished, will almost assuredly arouse the Chinese people in their own land to retaliation, and encourage the authorities there in their indisposition to bring to justice those who violate the treaty rights of American citizens residing in China. Thus the lives and property of Americans in that country are endangered, and the mouths of our minister and consuls, who would seek redress, are stopped.

We submit, seventh, that the press generally on this coast has not been outspoken and bold, as the circumstances demanded, in its denunciation of the foul crimes that have been committed. Thus crimes that outrage humanity have been condoned, and the impression has been created in other parts of our country that even the best citizens on the coast sympathize with and secretly approve the fearful deeds of the rioters.

In view of these considerations the undersigned memorialists feel justified and constrained to appeal to the Chief Magistrate of the nation and to the representatives of the people in both Houses of Congress to see that such measures shall be adopted as shall bring the offenders to justice and prevent the recurrence of such acts, and as shall maintain the honor and insure the fidelity of the American Government to its treaty stipulations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the petition of Agnes Young and other children of Zachariah Taylor, late private Company D, Forty-ninth United States Cavalry, praying to be allowed bounty and pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. JACKSON. I present the petition of Thomas R. Monahan, of Tennessee, complaining of having been improperly arrested and imprisoned in Mexico in 1884, and praying that Congress may take such action in the case as may be proper. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

He also presented a petition of Francis W. Hicks and 66 other citizens of Avondale, Pa., and vicinity, praying for the enactment of a law providing for the creation of a commission to inquire into the alcoholic liquor traffic; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Knights of Labor of Schuylkill County, Pennsylvania, praying for the construction by the Government of the Hennepin Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. EVARTS presented petitions of Knights of Labor of Buffalo, New York city, Columbia, Troy, and Coxsackie, in the State of New York, praying that liberal appropriations be made for works of internal improvement and especially for the construction of the Hennepin Canal; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon, presented a resolution of the Board of Trade of Portland, Oreg., remonstrating against the reduction of the duty on lumber and coal; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of P. B. Sinnatt, of Oregon, late Indian agent at Grand Ronde agency, Oregon, praying to be relieved from a judgment recently rendered against him on his official bond as such Indian agent in the district court of the United States for the district of Oregon; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I present resolutions of the Board of Trade of Portland, Oreg., favoring the passage of a law forfeiting and resuming lands between Wallula Junction and Portland, Oreg., heretofore withdrawn in favor of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company. I ask that the resolutions be printed in the RECORD, and that they be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The resolutions were referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas Congress has heretofore made to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, for the purpose of building a railroad from a point on Lake Superior to the city of Portland, Oreg., with a branch to Puget Sound, a grant of a large tract of land, under which grant 3,000,000 acres (approximately) have been withdrawn from market and are now withheld from settlement westward from Wallula Junction to Portland, Oreg., by reason thereof; and

Whereas said railroad company has failed, neglected, and refused to build said road westward from Wallula Junction to Portland, and has abandoned the same; and

Whereas the Columbia River, the great natural highway of the Columbia basin, when the Cascade locks (now far advanced) are completed, only needs a canal and locks at the Dalles to make said river open and navigable for a distance of 1,000 miles, thus aiding, in the wisest and best possible manner, the development of a great and growing region: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Board of Trade of the city of Portland, Oreg., That we respectfully petition Congress to pass such acts as shall be necessary to restore the lands heretofore withdrawn from market west of Wallula Junction to Portland, Oreg., to aid in the construction of the Northern Pacific Railroad, to the lands offered for sale and settlement by the United States, confirming to actual settlers their rights to such lands thereof as are occupied in good faith at a minimum price, and that proceeds of such lands be devoted to the building of a canal and locks from the Dalles to Celilo.

True copy, test:

[SEAL.] F. K. ARNOLD, Secretary.

PORTLAND, OREG., 16th March, 1886.

Mr. HOAR presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Southbridge, Westfield, Boston, Essex, Haverhill, Grafton, Gloucester, and Methuen, in the State of Massachusetts, and a petition of Knights of Labor of Norfolk County, Massachusetts, praying that liberal appropriations be made for works of internal improvement, and especially for the construction of the Hennepin Canal; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred the petition of J. I. Rodriguez in behalf of Mr. Cirilo Pouble, who claims to be a naturalized citizen of the United States and who is imprisoned in Cuba under the forms of Spanish law charged with insurrection and so on, to return the petition with a written report, and ask to be discharged from its further consideration.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 830) for the retirement of certain officers of the Navy of the United States, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. DOLPH, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of William Fitch, of the District of Columbia, praying for the reference of certain claims for timber used by the ARMY, to the Court of Claims under the so-called Bowman act, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. MCPHERSON, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 882) to equalize the pay of graduates of the Naval Academy, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SHERMAN introduced a bill (S. 1965) to authorize the commissioners of the District of Columbia to extend and widen certain streets and avenues of the city of Washington; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. CONGER. Let the bill be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is a long bill. Does the Senator ask for the reading of the bill?

Mr. CONGER. I should like to hear it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is a long bill. The bill will be read if there be no objection.

Mr. ALLISON. Does the Senator from Michigan really desire the bill to be read now?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The title of the bill will be again read, and the first section——

Mr. CONGER. There are several propositions to build street railroads on streets in the city, and to widen streets, and vacate streets, and vacate alleys, which are presented here, and when the time comes for their consideration we do not know how long they have been before the Senate, and the attention of Senators has not been called to them. I think such a bill as that, changing streets, widening streets, and giving to private owners public alleys, should be read in the hearing of the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. I think the Senator from Michigan will be satisfied if the bill is published in the RECORD.

Mr. CONGER. No; I do not care to have it so. I will find the bill and look at it myself.

Mr. ALLISON. If it is read it will be published in the RECORD; so it might as well be published in the RECORD without reading.

Mr. CONGER. Well, it may be published in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the bill will be ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. CONGER subsequently said: I desire to withdraw my request that the bill I referred to shall be published in the RECORD. I will examine the bill myself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order to print in the RECORD will be withdrawn if there be no objection. The bill will be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a bill (S. 1966) for the relief of E. R. Shipley; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. EVARTS introduced a bill (S. 1967) referring the claim of Clinton G. Colgate, of the city of New York, to the Court of Claims; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1968) to authorize the Postmaster-General to allow to the American Bank Note Company, in the settlement of its account, credit for the cost of certain postage-stamps furnished to the Post-Office Department; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. INGALLS introduced a bill (S. 1969) to provide for an additional term of the circuit court of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, and for the appointment of one additional associate justice thereof; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1970) to enable executors and administrators duly appointed in any of the United States or Territories to maintain suit and recover claims in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the resolution of the Senate of February 11, to print additional copies of the report of the Select Committee on Ordnance and War Ships.

The message also returned to the Senate, in compliance with its request, the bill (S. 284) granting a pension to Margaret B. Harwood.

The message also announced that the House had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 5893) to provide for certain of the most urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. 32) for the relief of Mrs. Lizzie D. Clarke, of New Orleans;

A bill (S. 353) for the relief of J. D. Morrison, surviving partner of C. M. & J. D. Morrison; and

A bill (H. R. 5893) to provide for certain of the most urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes.

PRICE OF GAS IN WASHINGTON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from yesterday under objection. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the following resolution, submitted yesterday by Mr. VAN WYCK:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be directed to report a bill providing that the price of gas furnished by the Washington Gaslight Company shall not exceed $1 per thousand cubic feet.

Mr. MORRILL. I suggest that the resolution be amended so as to read that they shall be directed to inquire into the expediency of making a reduction.

Mr. ALLISON. Should not the resolution go to the Committee on the District of Columbia?

Mr. MORRILL. I shall move that it go the Committee on the District of Columbia, for the reason that that committee for many years have had jurisdiction of the subject. They have had at the present session ever so many bills referred to them, and I shall ask to have the resolution referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves that the resolution be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Mr. President, a suggestion was made yesterday that neither the Senate nor any of its committees was probably sufficiently conversant with the facts connected with this company to say that the price should be reduced to $1 per thousand cubic feet.

It is unfortunate that this large city with 200,000 popoulation has not the first element of self-government connected with it. The people are powerless for their own protection, and yet Congress insists that this city shall have no legislation and no control and no protection except what is furnished by Congress itself. Therefore, from the action of Congress, these questions are necessarily thrust upon its attention. They can not be shirked nor avoided any more than the duties of a Senator to his own State. So it becomes incumbent upon Senators that they shall know the wants and the needs of this great city.

From the experience of the last three or four years one thing is evident, that three great powers in this city control—own, I might almost say; probably control would be nearer the truth—the Congress of the United States. Three corporations, I would say to my friend the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], substantially own the Congress of the United States. It is not necessary for the Senator to be alarmed. I do not mean owned in a commercial sense, but controlled to the extent of either doing or refusing to do what the corporations demand of Congress. That is all there is of it. That is the beginning and the end. Take the Washington Gaslight Company, the national banks, and the railroads, steam and horse-car, no matter how little and insignificant, even a bobtail line, they control the Congress of the United States today, and have done so for some few years past.

Mr. DAWES. Of which you are one.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Yes; of which I am one, the Senator from Massachusetts says. Certainly, and sometimes only one, to beg that there may be a little of justice and equity granted to these people.

Mr. FRYE. It is fortunate that we have one.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Precisely, so it is; and I wish my friend to rise to a higher standard, and then it would be still more fortunate if there were yet more, not only to aid us but to aid the people of the District of Columbia. It would be very much better. That is still the proposition. It is that those three organizations control the Congress of the United States.

Yesterday it was stated that there was not sufficient information to legislate upon this subject, but I suppose that certainly every citizen of Washington and nearly every member of Congress has had sufficient ordinary information. He gets that riding up and down in the street cars. He gets that by seeing overworked horses in front of the cars. He gets that by seeing overworked and unpaid laborers guiding the cars. No man can live here without seeing it. No man can be a member of this body without knowing it.

Then the national banks from their organization until now have not paid on their stock a dollar of local taxes. They have kept out of the public Treasury probably a quarter of a million dollars which honestly belongs to this city. I take it that everybody in Congress knows that. Your banks in Iowa, your banks in Massachusetts, your banks in Maine pay their local taxes, and yet in the District of Columbia not a dollar is paid. I should not say not a dollar. On their stock they do not pay a dollar; they pay a little on their office furniture. Nearly $3,000,000 are invested in this city in national banks, and yet only three hundred or four hundred dollars are paid on office furniture. I assume that every member of Congress knows that fact, and yet it runs year after year, and the people get no redress.

Mr. PLATT. May I ask for information whether the stockholders pay?

Mr. VAN WYCK. No, sir; $3,000,000 are kept from taxation when the taxes should be paid into the treasury of this city. Ah, gentlemen sometimes say this is a model city; we make it a model city. Certainly it is a model city, forsooth, with a debt upon it of $24,000,000. One-fourth of the assessed valuation of this city is its actual debt. A model city, forsooth! And you make it a model city by picking out the little shopkeepers, the small men, the mechanics, and the skilled laborers who are least able to bear the burden, and the national banks with more than $3,000,000 of capital pay no local tax in this city. Yes, you make it a model city in that way by putting the burdens upon the people who are least able to bear them!

One of the other things that have been fastened upon this city is the Washington gaslight corporation. The attention of the country has been generally directed, as we see in New York city and elsewhere, to this matter. It is true they have popular suffrage in New York city, and their people are able to rise up and extricate themselves as they did in the days of Tweed, when they banished him and exiled some of his gang. Will they be able to effect as much now? I see that a conservative paper in the city of New York in speaking of the extortioners there describes them as "gas pirates." There is a great deal to be said about protecting innocent investors. I trust no Senator will now take any exception to that phrase and lift his eyes in horror because they are described by a conservative paper in New York city as "pirates."

The Washington Gaslight Company was organized away back in 1848 with $500,000 capital. In a few years it was raised $350,000 additional, and now we are told that they paid not that in money out of their own pockets. Then their capital was increased to a million, and that million was made up of the $500,000 paid up and of dividends from earnings from year to year. That made a surplus account, and the additional $500,000 was paid in that way. Thus their capital was made a million. The president of the company swore it himself and they say they think that is right. Probably it was from their standpoint. In his report of 1880 or 1881 he says that inasmuch as money had been earned by the corporation, it was proper that the stock should be donated to the stockholders, and they donated it. Then when the stock was raised from $1,000,000 to $2,000,000, it was required that that should be paid in cash, and the company still proceeded to pay the other million out of the surplus revenues of the corporation. So all the money which these parties placed was $500,000. That was raised to $1,000,000 over the surplus fund. When it was increased to $2,000,000, it was by using the surplus fund in this way.

Two years before 1881 there was paid a regular dividend of 10 or 15 per cent. with an addition of 50 per cent. On this million dollars in two years, besides their 10, 15, or 20 per cent., 50 per cent. dividend was paid—a half million dollars in two years; and in a year or two further half a million more, making more than enough to pay this increased capital; and instead of transferring to the stockholders a certificate, they avoided that requirement of law by paying from the surplus revenues 50 per cent. each time into the pockets of the stockholders, and then paying it back into the corporation. So their stock was put at $2,000,000.

In 1880 and 1881, when there was some investigation of this matter and it was then charged that the corporation was to pay an extra dividend of 40 per cent., that was denied by the president of the corporation, and yet when their stock was $2,000,000, after paying their regular dividend of 10 or 15 per cent., they declared an extra dividend of 40 per cent., making an extra dividend in that one year of $800,000.

Now, need anything more be said? With their regular dividends two separate years of 50 per cent., making $1,000,000, and in 1883 an extra dividend of 40 per cent., making $800,000, from which the stockholders paid the increased capital, all then that the corporation had in money of their own which they had placed in their works was $500,000. Their stock was then increased to $2,000,000 from the surplus earnings, and not only $2,000,000, but $500,000 more had been placed, raising their works so that the value of the gas-works to-day is $2,500,000. Of that they paid themselves of their own money $500,000. They placed $500,000 of their own money, and they then added to the plant, increased its value not from money out of their own pockets, but from year to year they have received large dividends, and the $2,000,000 placed in their works was $2,000,000 taken from the pockets of the people, and that over and above the declaring of large annual dividends upon the stock.

I ask need anything more be said upon this matter? Two million five hundred thousand dollars is the amount, and to-day that stock is worth $4,000,000, because the shares are $20 each and the market price is $40. So for $500,000 invested they have $4,000,000 in value. But the stock was raised to $2,000,000 before 1881. Their dividends have kept on increasing from the fact that there was paid in one year $800,000 besides the regular annual dividend. It seems impossible, does it not? And yet the people of this city are under the protection of Congress, and these corporations are under the regulation of Congress, and that is their attitude to-day. "Pirates," I think they are called in New York city. They are not content with plundering, with stealing from the pockets of this people $2,000,000. It would have been bad enough to have stolen the $2,000,000, but they not only steal the $2,000,000, but they actually turn to these people and say they must have yearly dividends of 20 per cent. on what they steal on their property. That is what they claim. They must have an actual dividend upon the $2,000,000 in excess of what they themselves placed in of their own money, and the people must be subjected to that. That is the attitude.

Now, where is the hardship? It was provided in 1848, when the company was organized, that nothing in the act should be construed to prevent any person or persons, or any incorporated company hereafter to be created by Congress for that purpose, from enjoying, engaging in, and pursuing the business specified in the seventh section of the act. In 1848, when the company was organized, Congress told the corporators that it was not to interfere with any one pursuing this same calling, or another corporation being organized by Congress to pursue the same calling—to do what? Many times applications have been made to Congress to incorporate another company here, and as usual Congress has been deaf to those entreaties. It will be found that in an investigation a few years ago the president of this company himself unblushingly swore that he had employed a lobbyist to come to Congress—to do what? To prevent such legislation as the people of this District might demand. Mr. Bartol stated and swore that for two or three years he employed a man and paid him $5,000 per year. He put him on the same pay, if he did not give him the same rank, as a member of either body of Congress. He was paid that to come here to protect the people from legislation in the only way that legislation could protect the people, to see that Congress should not grant whatever the people might think they needed and what Congress might think they needed. This corporation was created by Congress and has been aided by the people, and yet unblushingly, when an attempt is made to check their rapacity, for which there seems to be no legal bound or control—this man unblushingly swore that he hired a lobbyist to invade Congress and protect the corporation in their interests.

Mr. President, I was desirous of saying this much on this matter so that we might understand some few of the facts connected with the subject. With the enormous wealth which these men have made, the corporation seems to suppose that the first great duty after the act of incorporation was passed was to allow them to make enormous dividends; and they think that Congress must keep its hands off and suffer them to be controlled by nothing except their own greed and their own rapacity.

On a thorough examination of this matter, it may be found that gas may be made and sold here at $1 per thousand. In Baltimore naphtha gas is furnished at 50 cents and coal gas at a dollar per thousand feet. Why not here? Look at these enormous prices and the profits! When we created a Pacific railroad and took some risk, as gentlemen said, in going over the plains and mountains, we provided that when the company's earnings were over 10 per cent. per annum they should be controlled by Congress in their charges. In regard to the great New York Central Railroad the Legislature of the State of New York provided that when the profits got to 8 per cent. there should be power in the State to control the charges. It is allowed here that this company shall receive 200 per cent. upon the original investment of $500,000.

I trust an examination will be had. I shall be excused for saying so much. I am gratified at the suggestion made by my friend from Iowa that this should be investigated by the Committee on the District of Columbia. I am entirely satisfied with the suggestion made by the Senator from Vermont that that committee shall be directed to inquire as to the lowest price for which gas can be made; and I trust there will be a speedy examination for the benefit of the public. I venture to say it can be established here by competent evidence that this kind of gas can be made for 50 cents per thousand; no doubt about it. We suppose we get coal gas here in the District, and yet I understand two cargoes of naphtha are used in the gas-works, from which this illuminating gas is made.

I beg pardon for having said so much, but I deemed it a duty to do so that attention might be called to it. We are the self-constituted guardians and protectors of the rights of the people of this District, and it is our duty at least to hear patiently their complaints and see to it that corporations shall take no more powers over the people than are necessary.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to say a single word, as I had charge of an investigation of this company a good many years ago. I do not say that the statements of fact which have been made by the Senator from Nebraska are all correct, but most of them were considered in that investigation, and the price of gas was fixed by Congress upon the ratio of the price and cost of coal. Since that period I desire to say that so far as I have been informed the company has not made a dividend of over 10 per cent. annually on $20, the original par value of the stock, and that the distribution of the $800,000 was an accumulation of years ago.

I do not desire to say anything to provoke any further discussion and consume the entire morning hour on this question, but I do desire to say that when the company was first started gas-making had been a recent discovery, and at the time of the investigation, in which I took part, the price of gas was I believe about $4 a thousand feet, and of course the business was very profitable. But the real difficulty, I will say to my friend from Nebraska, is in the price of coal here as compared with Baltimore, Philadelphia, or New York. I have myself bought Pennsylvania coal at Burlington, Vt., at a less price than I pay for it here at my house. In some way or other there is a railroad combination by which the price of coal is kept higher here than it is in any of our Atlantic cities. If the Senator can reach a remedy for that, I think there will be no difficulty in reaching a remedy as to the price of gas.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to refer the resolution to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. FRYE. The resolution ought to be amended. An amendment was suggested by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. MORRILL. I understand the Senator from Nebraska consented to the amendment I suggested.

Mr. INGALLS. Let it be reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be reported as originally introduced.

The Secretary read the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves an amendment which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed in the second line of the resolution, after the word "to," to strike out "report" and insert "inquire into the expediency of reporting;" so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be directed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill providing that the price of gas furnished by the Washington Gaslight Company shall not exceed $1 per thousand cubic feet.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be considered as agreed to if there be no objection. The motion is to refer the resolution to the Committee——

Mr. HOAR. I understand the purpose of the mover is not to refer the resolution, but to give the direction to make the inquiry to the committee. That should be done by substituting one committee for another and passing the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the resolution as amended, and then probably Senators will see.

The Secretary read the resolution as amended as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be directed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill providing that the price of gas furnished by the Washington Gaslight Company shall not exceed $1 per thousand cubic feet.

Mr. MORRILL and others. That is right.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Did I understand the Senator from Vermont to say that they had not received over 7 per cent. dividend?

Mr. MORRILL. I did not say so.

Mr. VAN WYCK. What did the Senator say?

Mr. MORRILL. I said that if my information was correct they had not paid over 10 per cent. dividend on $20 a share. I do not know, for I have taken no interest in the matter for years.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The Senate will allow me just one moment to show that what I said on that matter was correct. In November, 1868, there was an examination made. I remember the report referred to by the Senator from Vermont by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and it was for that reason that I offered the resolution as I did ordering the investigation to be by that committee. The Senator was on that committee, and he gave an exhaustive inquiry to it at that time and reported a bill under which the company has since been acting; but in 1881 there was another examination and then this appeared:

November 1, 1868, the cash cost of the works exceeded $1,000,000, while the capital stock was but $500,000. The company having, by act of Congress approved March 24, 1866, obtained the authority to increase the capital stock to $1,000,000, the directors at this time issued to each of the then stockholders as many additional shares of stock as they then held; this was considered to be but just and right, as the earnings of the company, beyond dividends paid, had been invested in increasing the value of the works.

Does not that prove what I stated? They had the annual dividends, and they had saved surplus enough to divide $500,000 more.

This was considered to be just and right, as the earnings of the company, beyond dividends paid, had been invested in increasing the value of the works. This issue of stock was fully investigated before the passage of the act regulating gas-works, approved June 23, 1874. (See Senate report No. 306, Forty-third Congress, first session.)

In February, 1869, 5 per cent. was paid, in May, 10 per cent., and 5 per cent. in August. That was 15 per cent. on the million, and of that million they only paid in $500,000 of their own money. That made 30 per cent. on their own money, did it not, I ask the Senator from Vermont? Thirty per cent. on their own money that they had paid in? Admit that that $500,000 was a gift, because they had saved the surplus earnings, paying dividends all the time; in 1869 they were declaring 30 per cent. on their original investment.

Mr. MORRILL. I remember all that the Senator stated the first time he spoke. I do not think there is any necessity for repeating it. I do not pretend to be familiar with the affairs of the company since the investigation of 1874.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I understand that; but I want that the Senator should be familiar with that branch of it. In February, 1870, 5 per cent. was paid, and the same in August of that year. In 1871, 5 per cent. was paid in February, 5 per cent. was paid in April, and 5 per cent. in August. There was 30 per cent. in one year again on the original investment. In February, 1873, 5 per cent. was paid, 10 per cent. in May, and 5 per cent. in August. There was 20 per cent., which made 40 per cent. on the original investment. In February, 1874, 5 per cent. was paid, and 50 per cent. was paid in August of that year—50 per cent. besides the regular dividend, being $500,000, because the stock was a million. When they made that extra dividend they put in their own pockets all the money they had ever paid in on the works, $500,000, in one year, besides the regular dividend. This was an extra dividend of 50 per cent. which gave them $500,000; and that was all the money they had put in originally.

Again in 1875, in February, 5 per cent. was paid, 5 per cent. in May, and 10 per cent. in August. That was 20 per cent. on the $1,000,000, or 40 per cent. again on the original investment. In February, 1876, 5 per cent. was paid, 5 per cent. in May, and 5 per cent. in August, making 15 per cent. In February, 1879, 5 per cent. was paid, 5 per cent. in June, and 5 per cent. in August. In February, 1880, 5 per cent. was paid, 5 per cent. in June, and 5 per cent. in August. Then we come down to 1881, from which we asked them the other day to give us a statement, and here it is:

I. The capital stock of the company is $2,000,000.

I have already stated how that other million was put in by the extra dividend of 40 per cent.

I. The capital stock of the company is $2,000,000.
II. The following dividends have been paid since January 1, 1881: February, 1881, 5 per cent.; August, 1881, 5 per cent.; February, 1882, 5 per cent.

There was 15 per cent. on the $2,000,000, or 60 per cent. on the original investment. Then the next year:

August, 1882, 5 per cent.; February, 1883, 5 per cent.; May, 1883, 40 per cent.

Forty per cent. on $2,000,000 extra dividend; $800,000 in that dividend, and these men had only planted of their own money $500,000 in this concern. Look at it a moment. "The dividend of May, 1883," you see "was the accumulation of years when gas was selling at much higher rates"—the small sum of $800,000!

It is not necessary for me to examine it further here. I have read this much to show that the statement I made in my first remarks was correct upon their own showing. These papers from which I have read are of course made by the company themselves.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the resolution will be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia. It is so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. R. 39) to authorize the printing of the proceedings in Congress in accepting the statue of the late James A. Garfield, President of the United States.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. 416) for the relief of J. M. Lobban;

A bill (S. 887) for the relief of Robert H. Anderson, of the State of Georgia;

A bill (H. R. 1245) to authorize the increase of the capital stock of the First National Bank of Shakopee, Minn.;

A bill (H. R. 5841) granting a pension to Almira Russell Hancock, widow of Winfield Scott Hancock, late a major-general in the United States Army; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 71) authorizing the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds in the District of Columbia to supply plants and shrubs to fill certain vases in the Pension building.

EFFICIENCY OF THE ARMY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business of the morning hour according to the order of the Senate.

The consideration of the bill (S. 777) to increase the efficiency of the Army of the United States was resumed as in Committee of the Whole, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. HALE to strike out section 2 of the bill.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I do not intend to detain the Senate by discussing this bill in its details. The main features of the bill I shall have nothing to say of or concerning. I know but little about them, and I shall leave their discussion to those who are better qualified, if the bill is to become a law, to discuss those questions. I trust I may discuss the feature proposed to be stricken out by the amendment of the Senator from Maine, the second section of the bill, without having it supposed that I am moved or instigated by any hostility to the committee or any member of the Committee on Military Affairs, or that I have entered into any combination with anybody else of or concerning this bill. I never knew that such a bill had been presented to the Senate until I heard the Senator from Maine discussing it the day before yesterday, if I recollect correctly.

The only feature that I desire to call the attention of the Senate to is the proposition to increase the Army from twenty-five thousand to thirty thousand men. I do not know when the present organization was established, but for a number of years at least the force has been substantially what it is to-day. Senators who favor this part of the bill do so from different standpoints. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], who spoke upon it the other day, and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON], who spoke yesterday, go on the theory that we need this increased number of soldiers with reference to the Indians or to probable Indian wars that they anticipate. The chairman of the committee [Mr. LOGAN], if I understand him, has two reasons why he wants the increase. First, he thinks the Army would be more efficient by it, and he thinks with a larger number of men in the regiments they would drill more successfully and would be in every way more efficient. Another reason of his is that the officers who bring them into the field on parade and on gala days will have more pride in the Army than they now have.

I do not know that thirty thousand is an excessive number of men for the people of the United States to support; certainly it is not beyond our ability. Yet we should not in the nature of things have a single soldier that we do not need. Unless we need men as a nucleus for an army that we may some day wish to put in the field when circumstances may require, or because there is an immediate and pressing necessity for this force, we ought not to provide for an army at all. At least for ten years there have been but twenty-five thousand men in the Army; how much longer I do not care to look, because it is not material.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator will allow me a suggestion. I know he wants to discuss this matter logically and properly, and sometimes we all make mistakes about these things. I wish to state to the Senator, so that he will understand it, that there never have been twenty-five thousand men in the Army since it was established at that number by the law as it is to-day.

Mr. TELLER. I understand.

Mr. LOGAN. Afterward it was reduced by the Congress of the United States to twenty-two thousand, I think; at least that number was fixed in a bill that came to the Senate. That brought it down to much less than that number in fact. In the Appropriations Committee it was increased to twenty-five thousand again. So it was left at that. Now, I will call the Senator's attention to this fact: The law now making the total number twenty-five thousand in the aggregate, the actual number is less; and if this increase be authorized the actual number would be about twenty-six thousand, including officers and all—twenty-five thousand seven hundred and odd.

Mr. TELLER. This applies to men, not officers.

Mr. LOGAN. I understand; but I am speaking of the aggregate. The men now amount to twenty-three thousand six hundred and ninety-six. Under the law the Army is established at twenty-five thousand, and it has not been in excess of that for many years. I call the Senator's attention to that fact, so that he may see that the proposition we make for thirty thousand men will not, taking into consideration the casualties and all the incidents of an army, bring the Army up to more than twenty-seven thousand men probably at any time—effective men in the Army, I mean.

Mr. BLAIR. By consent of the Senator from Colorado I wish to ask the Senator from Illinois a question, not having had time to examine the bill. I do not understand that the regimental organizations are changed, but are simply filled up by an additional number of men.

Mr. LOGAN. The organization is this: There are twenty-five regiments of infantry, ten regiments of cavalry, five regiments of artillery, and one battalion of engineers. That is the organization of the Army to-day, besides light companies.

Mr. BLAIR. This increase is of enlisted men.

Mr. LOGAN. Of enlisted men. The law authorizes the enlistment of twenty-five thousand men. The casualties incident to the service and the Army leave the enlistment to-day at about twenty-three thousand men called effective men. It is now proposed to increase the limit to thirty thousand—five thousand additional in the law, which, in my judgment, would increase it to about twenty-six thousand men, or not over twenty-seven thousand at the furthest.

Mr. BLAIR. There will then be the same number of regiments.

Mr. LOGAN. Precisely; it does not change the organization at all. It is only filling up the framework. I beg pardon of the Senator from Colorado for taking his time; but I desired to make these suggestions, so that in his argument he might understand the case.

Mr. TELLER. I thoroughly understand that. I do not know very much about the Army, but I know the number of men there are in the Army, because I have read it in the reports very frequently. I knew that the limit fixed by law applied to the soldiers, not to the total force of officers and men. I knew what everybody knows who had any experience in the world, that if you have twenty-five thousand men in the Army nominally, you have not got an effective force of twenty-five thousand men. I suppose if you put the aggregate at thirty thousand by law you would not have an effective force of thirty thousand; you would have a proportionate increase of the effective force.

The question simply is, Do we need any additional men in the Army to-day, and, if so, for what purposes? The Senator who has charge of the bill does not claim that we need them for the purpose of war, the only purpose for which we should be justified, I think, in increasing the Army at this time. The Senator from Nebraska, who has given much attention to the question and is a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, thinks that we need them for a specific purpose, to guard against the danger of Indian outbreaks, and the Senator from Vermont agrees with him on that.

I have not any doubt that it is thought by all of the Army officers, very likely including the Secretary of War, that it is necessary to increase the Army to thirty thousand men. I have never known a military man yet who did not want to have as big a force under him as he could get; he wanted all the command at his disposal that was possible; and if you would submit this question to the Lieutenant-General or the Secretary of War or to a council of officers, you would increase your Army much beyond thirty thousand men if you were to follow their suggestions.

In this country the question of the size of the Army is determined by the legislative department of the Government. While I do not claim to have had any military education or to have served in the military service, I think the question whether twenty-five thousand men are necessary for the maintenance of peace on the frontier or as a necessary nucleus for an army can just as well be determined by men who are entirely without experience of that kind as by those who have spent a lifetime in the service. The Senator from Nebraska brings with him much experience on the frontier, and he spoke with some feeling and with considerable zeal in the interest of the people of the frontier settlements. I will not yield to any man on this floor or anywhere else in anxiety to protect that class of people. They are the people with whom I have lived for the better part of my life. They are the people with whom I have sacrificed and served in that new country. And if I believed for a moment that there was danger that a raid would be made in his State or any other on that class of people, there is not too much money that could be voted in their interest and for their protection, so far as I am concerned. But I am convinced that the day has passed when the Indian question has to be settled by the military arm of the Government. I am satisfied that there is no great danger to the settlers in Colorado, in Nebraska, in Kansas, New Mexico, or Arizona now from hostile Indians. We have had no considerable Indian war for a number of years.

There was in the spring of 1882 a raid made by a few hundred Apache Indians in Arizona. It was the first considerable outbreak that had been known for several years; not but what there had been small outbreaks perhaps every year previous, but no considerable disturbance had occurred up to the spring of 1882, and from that time until the summer of 1885 no considerable outbreak has occurred; in fact, I may say no outbreak at all. In the spring of 1885 a number of Indians, variously estimated from twenty-five to seventy-five, probably fifty would be a fair estimate, went on the war-path in Arizona. They have probably killed at least two hundred white people of that section of country; but the officer in command has declared that he did not want any more troops, that he had all that were necessary, and that more troops would not have prevented this outbreak.

There is no portion of the country to-day, in my judgment, that needs a standing army for the protection of the settlements against Indians. I know the Senator spoke of the vast number of Indians that could be aggregated in the Territory of Dakota, on the border of the State of Nebraska, and on the border of other settlements. Why, Mr. President, there are in the Territory of Dakota about thirty thousand Indians that from their habits of association together, if an outbreak should occur, might and probably would combine. They are, however, situated far apart, 250 miles from one agency to another. They could not pass over the country without giving full notice to all sections that they were on the war-path. While the Senator says that they might put in the field ten thousand warriors, the Senator knows, as everybody knows now, that it would be utterly impossible for them to maintain that or any considerable number of men in the field to-day.

The safety of the people from Indian wars does not result entirely from the changed condition of the Indian, while I believe there is much in that. It does not entirely consist in that, for if the circumstances were as they were when Sitting Bull and his party met Custer, I have no doubt the same sentiment would actuate them and they might go upon the war-path as they did then. But the region in which they are placed is destitute of supplies to maintain an army of that kind. They could not maintain themselves in the field more than a few days, and that fact is known to the Indians just as well as it is known to the best military man in the United States; and the Indians are not going upon the war-path with a certainty that within a very short time they would be starved out and compelled to meet the forces of the United States and beg of them bread.

There is, as was stated by the Senator from Nebraska, a large body of Indians on the northern border of his State, armed, as he said, with Winchester rifles, thoroughly equipped for war, and there is a possibility that a little party may go out on a scalping expedition, may get down into the settlements, and may destroy some small settlement before they could be repulsed. The attention of Congress has been called over and over again for many years to the absurdity of allowing these men to carry with them arms that they have no use for unless it is to slay their fellow-men. The honorable Senator says that they could not be disarmed. He says that you are compelled to leave them with their Winchesters and their improved fire-arms because the United States has not an army sufficient to disarm them. Why, Mr. President, we know that within the last three years the Army was willing to disarm the most desperate characters of the tribe if there had been a law authorizing them so to do. There is no such authority given to the Army, and no such authority given to the Secretary of the Interior, who is charged with maintaining peace on the frontier. Give them the authority, and they will see that these people do not carry around with them arms that are useless to them and only keep them from engaging in the lawful pursuits of life.

It is said that there are a small number of troops at the Western posts. There is in the RECORD this morning a list of all the posts in the United States at which troops are found. I notice that in the Indian Territory there are six hundred and twenty-eight soldiers. I have never heard anybody yet declare that that was not enough for the maintenance of peace in that section. There are are in Dakota perhaps something more, and in New Mexico and Arizona a still greater number; and yet I have never heard it said, in the last three or four years at least, that there is any paucity of troops to meet any outbreak that might occur there. Some of the troops are in places where they ought not to be; some of them ought to be transported to other places; and I am told by the Army officers they are kept in these places simply because they have no shelter for them in other places where they would be more accessible and more useful to the service. Because there have not been appropriations made of the proper character, so that they might build accommodations for them, they are compelled to scatter them in posts where they are of no earthly account or use.

I do not know how much it will cost to add five thousand men to the Army. I know what the Army costs. I do not suppose that one-fifth added would cost one-fifth more. I suppose, though, it would be safe to say that when the Army costs about twenty-seven or twenty-eight million dollars a year, which it costs now, if you add five thousand men, or one-fifth more, certainly it would cost from three to four or five million dollars. The Senator from Illinois shakes his head; I will put it at half; I will say it costs two and a half million dollars, and it will certainly cost that; because, if these men are to be effective for the purpose suggested by the Senator from Nebraska, they are not to be footmen; they must be cavalrymen. It is useless to talk about fighting Indians with infantry, and nobody knows that better than the chairman of this committee and the Senator from Nebraska. I do not suppose an Indian ever was killed by an infantryman unless it was in an attack on some post.

Mr. MANDERSON. If it will not interrupt the Senator——

Mr. TELLER. Not at all.

Mr. MANDERSON. On the matter of cost, I can give him the information perhaps that he desires, so that he may address himself to that subject.

Mr. TELLER. I shall be glad to get it.

Mr. MANDERSON. The monthly pay for the enlisted man under this bill is $16 a month, where now by law it is $13 a month.

Mr. TELLER. I think that is a desirable feature in the bill.

Mr. MANDERSON. I think so. The daily cost of rations to each enlisted man is 20 cents, making the monthly cost of rations $6. The annual allowance for clothing to each man is $36; monthly cost, $3. Thus it will be seen that the monthly cost of each soldier is $25; annual cost, $300. Five thousand additional men would cost $1,500,000.

Mr. TELLER. Infantry.

Mr. MANDERSON. No; it is any soldier of the United States.

Mr. TELLER. Cavalrymen require horses.

Mr. MANDERSON. Perhaps that would be an incidental expense. I speak of the matter of sustenance, of feeding and clothing these troops. Take the matter of transportation, and that about equalizes itself. If you add this additional number, it will not be so necessary to make transfers. In other words, you have the plant for a very much larger army than you have to-day.

Mr. TELLER. I understand that. We have the plant. It would be easy to divide the $28,000,000 the Army costs into five parts, and then say this would cost one-fifth more. That, however, would not be fair, because I suppose the same officers will command these men that command the others; the same posts with a few exceptions will cover these that cover the others. So I did not suppose the excess would be one-fifth greater, but I thought that $3,000,000 might be a fair estimate of the amount. I heard a gentleman say who is somewhat familiar with military affairs he thought certainly the bill would cost $7,000,000. I do not know on what he based it; I did not ask the particulars, and I can not see exactly why it should cost that much. But the Senator from Nebraska puts it at $1,500,000. Some portion of these forces must be cavalrymen. These men must be armed. I think the Senator has made no provision for their arms.

Mr. MANDERSON. We have plenty of arms.

Mr. TELLER. I think that if I should say that two and a half millions would be the expense added by this it would be a very reasonable and fair estimate. I am not particular whether the Senators who favor this bill assume that it is two millions, or two and a half millions, or even that it is a million and a half.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him right there——

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. I am perfectly willing to give any information. This has been printed; I have an estimate made of the additional expense to the Government if this bill should pass just as it is, the increased pay of the soldiers that are now enlisted and of the additional five thousand. The Senator will find by examining the report made by the Paymaster-General that he estimates the cost at $1,900,184 additional, including the whole bill.

Mr. TELLER. That, I have no doubt, is made up exactly in the same way as the honorable Senator from Nebraska makes his estimate. There is no provision for the men who are mounted. A certain proportion of them certainly must be mounted men. The proportion at least of mounted men of the whole Army must be maintained; I do not know how many that will be. So under any circumstances it is safe to say that the bill will add to the public expense somewhere in the neighborhood anyhow of $2,000,000.

Now the question simply is, Do we at this time need it? Is there any necessity at this time, when our revenues are shrinking and when our expenditures are increasing, to increase that which does the least possible good to the people of the United States, unless the additional force is needed for the purpose which the Senator from Nebraska thinks they are. War is not a productive pursuit, and the men who enter into the United States Army are withdrawn from the productive ranks of the people. I do not myself want to see the Army increased; I have yet to see the necessity for it; and the Senator from Nebraska has not convinced me that there is a necessity for it even for the purpose which he indicated.

I do not propose upon this bill to discuss the oft-debated and hackneyed question of Indian policy; but I do think it is pretty late in the day, when the settlements have surrounded the Indian reservations everywhere and civilization has broken into the reservations in spite of restrictions put upon it by the law, when the people everywhere are surrounding and carrying to the Indians civilization and Christianity, that we should attempt here to increase the Army for the purpose of protecting our citizens against these blood-thirsty Indians. I do not believe there is a necessity in that respect for as many soldiers as we have on the frontier to-day. I said here on this floor, and I repeat it, that had the Government authorized the Secretary of the Interior in 1883 to put his hand on the children of the Chiricahuas there would have been no war with the Chiricahuas in 1885. I do not lay it at the door of the chairman of your Military Affairs Committee, for I know he has had the same views of this question that I have had, that the Government had the right to take those children and put them in school and make them civilized, whether they wanted to be or not. If you take this two millions of money and devote it to that purpose instead of devoting it to the Army, you will do more toward maintaining peace on the frontier than if you double and treble the Army of the United States.

I can take the $2,000,000, put the Indian children in industrial schools, and maintain peace on all the reservations in the United States without a single soldier. You do not need a solitary man with a musket when you have the Indian children under your control and within your reach. You can take them and make them hostages for the most turbulent and discontented of all the Indians if you will put them in schools and put them where occasionally the Indian father and the Indian mother may go and see and know that they are being cared for by the Government of the United States. Red Cloud and his Indian faction in Dakota are not willing to send their children to school. Enact a law that will enable the agent to take those children, who are of suitable age and suitable mental and physical condition, and put them in the school at Lawrence, Kans., put them in the school at Genoa, put them in the school at Hampton, put them in the school at Carlisle, and if you have not enough of them other schools of the like character, and you will settle the Indian question without bayonet and without blood.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President——

Mr. MANDERSON. If the Senator from Connecticut will allow me one moment, I simply desire to correct a statement——

Mr. PLATT. Just a moment. I want to make some remarks, and I have not a great deal of time.

Mr. MANDERSON. I only wish to correct a statement made by the Senator from Colorado with reference to the number of the Sioux Nation on the northern border of Nebraska. I agree with him that this is a very extensive reservation, and I simply want to call his attention to the fact that at the Pine Ridge, Rosebud, and Yankton agencies, all of them within a very few miles of the northern border of Nebraska, there are 18,198 Sioux at those three agencies alone.

Mr. TELLER. That is a fact which I understood very well.

Mr. PLATT. When this amendment was moved by the Senator from Maine I was led upon the spur of the moment to say that I desired to make an amendment increasing the Army to fifty thousand men. I see that that is entirely useless. I confess that I do not understand the reasons or the motives which influence Senators against any increase of the Army, but I am satisfied that it is useless to talk about any increase other than is recommended by the Committee on Military Affairs, and therefore I shall not move the amendment which I proposed. Still, I think the Army ought to be fifty thousand men, and I want to discharge my duty as a Senator by giving the reasons why I think not only that this bill should pass, but that the Army should be increased more than is proposed by the bill.

Mr. President, we have no army. It is a misnomer to talk about the Army of the United States. It is not an army. It is a body of detached enlisted men serving as a police force. That is what we have. We have no body of men that can be concentrated within a week's time so as to furnish five thousand men to take the field. We have a mere skeleton, perhaps, of an army; and now the question is whether a great nation like this, the richest and most powerful nation in the world, and a nation which is to be called upon in the near future to have something to say about the affairs of the world, can afford to rest in this condition as to an army.

For my own part, it seems to me that, if there were nothing else in this case, decent national housekeeping, so to speak, requires more soldiers than we have now. I should just as soon think of asking the Senator from Maine, who occupies a nice house here in Washington, to require the lady of the house to do the housework, and then, when he had some company or an extra dinner, send out and get in the neighbors to help on the occasion, as to let this nation go on without any soldiers that can be efficiently organized and without any troops worthy the name of an army.

It is all well enough to say that we are at peace, peace with the whole world, and therefore we want no army. That argument is just this: It does not rain to-day, the skies are clear to-day, therefore it will never rain, and it is unwise to provide shelter for our families. I can not understand that argument. It is utterly fallacious.

We are, as I said, a great nation, the greatest in the world. We have been making money so fast and we have devoted ourselves so exclusively to the development of our material resources that we have to-day no policy as a nation. We do not realize that being such a nation as we are, and especially being a republic, and this Republic having come to stand as the first nation of the world, we have a mission to perform, that we have something to say with regard to what shall be done in the great household of nations. I do not mean to say that we should depart from the precept of the fathers, that we will have no complications or entangling alliances with other nations if we can avoid it, but we must realize that we have duties to perform, duties to perform to the world, that we must not only set the example of republican government, but that if questions arise in which a great republic is called in the exercise and discharge of its duty to humanity to say something, we must be in a condition to enforce what we say, or at least have what we say respected. Such is not our condition now.

But there is one thing that every member of the Senate will say that we must do in the great household of nations, that we must enforce on this continent the Monroe doctrine—namely, that we will not allow any foreign nation to plant its flag either by way of colonization or conquest upon the western hemisphere. We are in no condition to say this. If any nation of Europe chose to colonize in South America, or chose to take a hand in any conflict which arose between South American nations with a view to conquest, we are in no condition whatever to say to that nation "You must not do it." I speak what every Senator in this body knows; and, Mr. President, this colonial policy has broken out in the Old World. It is a fever; it is a craze in the blood of the old nations. All commercial nations are looking for lands to extend their trade. The place to which eyes are cast most longingly is the South American country, and it is too much to expect that without an army the United States is to be able to prevent colonization and conquest and monarchical governments being established in South America for the purpose of extending the trade of European nations. We extend trade by peaceable means. European nations extend trade at the point of the bayonet. That is the difference between monarchical governments and republican governments.

Now, I am not going to talk about the matter of rendering the Army efficient by a slight increase with reference to the Indian question. My judgment is that, however Senators may differ, there is no Senator familiar with the condition of the frontier and the condition of the Indians who for a moment will consent that any of the troops shall be withdrawn from that section of the country. I doubt whether the Senator from Colorado will consent to-day that a thousand or two thousand men shall be taken from the States and Territories west of the Mississippi and the Missouri Rivers. I set that out of the question.

We have east of the States of Texas, of Arkansas, of Kansas, of Nebraska, and Minnesota less than five thousand men in the Army. We have a population probably of 50,000,000 people east of those States. We have great cities east of those States, great wealth, great interests to be protected. We have probably 5,000 miles of seacoast and northern frontier east of those States—perhaps more. What have we to protect it with? All is peace, the gentlemen say; we never can have any war; but the history of nations and the history of this country shows us that we can not avoid complications with foreign powers. Now, what have we to protect these vast interests with? We have less than five thousand officers and enlisted men, all told, available for such protection and defense, and of those I venture to say that at least two thousand are so detailed that they can not be used as fighting men. The few soldiers we have are scattered from Eastport to New Orleans and along the great lakes and in the interior. We have perhaps three thousand fighting men if they could be got together, but they could not be got together in a fortnight.

Did I not say rightly when I said we had no Army? Take away the troops that are necessary, I think necessary, to prevent Indian hostilities, to prevent the scalping of a few men, which the Senator from Colorado admits may possibly be done—set that out of the question, and what have you left? You can not take troops away from the Mexican border, and you have three thousand men to defend this nation with. It is tempting fate; it is tempting the cupidity of weak nations. We can not compete either with army or navy or coast defense with any third-class power in the world. Senators may say that there is no danger; but there is at least the possibility—I will not use the word "danger"—there is the possibility that we may become entangled, we may have complications with some foreign government. But Senators say that in case of foreign invasion all we want is a navy, all we want is seacoast defenses. Do the Senators suppose that with an attack by Spain or Italy or China or Chili we could get along with these three thousand men who are scattered over this vast eastern territory; that there would be no other need for land forces? Have they forgotten——

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator if he anticipates that in case we had trouble with a foreign power they would invade this country?

Mr. PLATT. I was going to reply to that argument. I remember that in the war of 1812 the towns along the seashore of New England, of Connecticut, my own State, were burned by land forces, forces that were landed; and I remember that in 1814 this Capitol was burned, that troops came up the Potomac River and burned the Capitol, and, I think, burned the President's mansion. They can do it again. Any one of the powers of which I have spoken can do it, and if we have difficulty with any foreign government they are going to do it.

People rely upon torpedo defenses, but torpedo defenses must be operated from the shore, and the places from which they are operated must be protected by troops on the shore or they can not be operated. I do not think a great deal myself of torpedo defenses, but the efficiency of them depends upon protecting the places on shore from which they are to be operated.

Now, Mr. President, I agree that the skies are clear; that now there is no cloud even of the size of a man's hand on the horizon; but war clouds gather darkness quickly when they arise, and we are not entirely even to-day beyond the possibility of difficulty with foreign nations. Upon our northeastern border there is gathering trouble. I pray God that it may not result in conflict with Canadian troops; but it may. Down on our southwestern border is the Republic of Mexico. We all know that the Diaz government is favorable to American institutions and to the United States; but that government is liable to overthrow, and we all know that the opposition party is hostile to the Government of the United States and to our citizens and to our ways. Suppose that in that country of revolutions the Diaz government be overthrown, what is the life or property of an American citizen in Mexico worth? Not an hour's purchase. And what are we to do? How many troops has Mexico? Alas, there are at least forty-five thousand in the Mexican army, and they are pretty good soldiers, too. I do not say that such difficulties are coming. They may come. We can not afford to be unprepared for them.

Let me take another illustration. We have been doing some very wicked things with regard to Chinamen in this country. Our citizens have been murdering them, and a good many of them. I do not know what China will do about it. I know what we should do about it if American citizens had been thus murdered in China; and if China does what we should do about it, we may imagine that she sends her two iron-clad ships over convoying vessels which contain her troops. If she should, we might assemble the whole United States Navy in front of the city of San Francisco, and her two ships would, to use a farmer's phrase, mow a double swath through them. She would then land her troops there to march up and down that coast and destroy and kill all under the plea of retaliation. Can we afford it? Can we afford to remain thus unprotected?

I can not understand this squeamishness, for I can call it nothing else, that Senators seem to have about having a standing army. Take the table which I put in the RECORD yesterday, and it will be seen from it that the most troops we have in any one place is at Fort Leavenworth, and there but between five hundred and six hundred. I can not understand how it is supposed that in all this great eastern population and territory one soldier to ten thousand men, as it is to-day, is a standing menace to the liberties of the people. It seems to me, Mr. President, that the fears of Senators are drawn from their imagination and outrun their judgment in this respect. We have 10,000 miles of seacoast, and not a protected seaport in all that 10,000 miles of seacoast. We have seaports in which either Italy or Spain or Chili or any other power or equal magnitude and strength can land its troops and in one day destroy more property than this increase to the Army will cost in twenty years, and we are absolutely powerless to prevent it. This is not a pleasant statement, but the truth had better be told and heeded.

No danger, Senators say! The history of the world, I repeat, shows there is danger, and until the argument and appeal of the Friends is heeded and we have an international court of arbitration, there is and there always will be danger. They say this nation is a giant. So it is; but the most helpless, pitiable person in God's world is a giant bound hand and foot and unable to exert his strength; and that is just the condition of the United States, and the whole world knows it. We can not only not protect our seaports, but we can not protect our citizens in foreign lands. We could never repeat the warning and the demand which we made to Austria in the days of Martin Koszta; and, if you will run over the history of the past few years, you will find that this nation has been suffering its citizens to be outraged and has been suffering such indignities at the hands of weak nations because it had no power to enforce its demands.

It is said we can rely on our militia. Well, to a certain extent we can. That is a fair argument in this discussion. We can not, however, rely on our militia so well without an army as we can with an army. We can rely upon the militia as a supplement, as an adjunct to a well-organized, well-trained, and well-disciplined force, but right in here comes this idea—war is no longer a matter of numbers. It now approaches more of the character of old wars, where strength and skill won the day instead of numbers—not so much strength now perhaps as skill. Men, in order to be effective fighting men, must be thoroughly trained in the use of the best arms, whether they be infantry or whether they be artillery. A regiment of men carefully trained in the use of arms of precision are more than a match for many more in numbers of the militia. We want men enough in the regular Army so that the militia shall be trained by them, instructed by them, who shall stand steady when the militia might break.

But it is said that we may rely on volunteers, that we have done it, and that we can do it again. But it was well said the other day by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON] that if we had had an army of fifty thousand men there would not have been any rebellion, that the immense expenditure of treasure, and worse than that this fearful waste of life, would never have taken place; and yet Senators talk to-day about economy. To that argument of economy I reply that if we had had fifty thousand loyal men on the 13th day of April, 1861, we should have had comparatively nothing of this great expenditure of blood and treasure; an expenditure of treasure going on even now with a constantly increasing volume. Our seventy-five millions per year is but a part of the expenditure which would have been avoided had we had a loyal army of fifty thousand at the breaking out of the rebellion. Rely upon volunteers, upon the people of Maine if a force should come down from Canada! Every man of them would want $300 bounty, and if any of them happened to be wounded they would require to be pensioned at a large sum, and it would be right to pension them. I make no complaint of liberal bounties or liberal pensions for volunteers. It is right that they should have them. I only say that it is economy to have trained soldiers ready for any emergency.

The Senator from Maine had better even on that score alone have a few men at Fort Preble.

Now, Mr. President, my time has nearly expired. I have but one thing more to say. Our present Army—I call it so—increased to the extent asked for by this committee, would be about one soldier to two thousand inhabitants in this whole country. Does any Senator really rise to say that is a standing menace to the liberties of the people? Compare that to a real standing army. When we say "standing army" we mean something that is a burden. Ours is no burden, it is a bagatelle compared with the work which we may have for it to do.

I was both sorry and surprised to hear the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] yesterday intimate that there was some reason not disclosed why our little Army should be made more efficient. If I understood him, he intimated that that undisclosed reason was that we might have troops in the neighborhood of our great manufacturing centers and our great cities to overawe and to put down bodies of men who might be rising to assert their right, as he said, against great monopolies and privileges which capitalists often unjustly obtain.

Mr. President, I want to say one thing. There is domestic danger in this country which justifies the maintenance of troops. It does not arise from the honest industrial classes of the country; it does not arise from any bodies of laborers associated together for their own benefit and to better their condition. There is no danger to be apprehended from them. They have interests to be protected. But the danger does arise from those that have come here from foreign countries with no good intention toward the American Government, toward our form of government, or toward our social order—men who raise the red flag of the commune, and who assert that their object is revolution, and that the result aimed at by them is to be accomplished by bloodshed and the destruction of property.

Even while we have been discussing this bill the seventeenth anniversary of the commune in Paris has been celebrated in New York, and a magazine of communistic weapons, bombs and dynamite, has been discovered in Chicago. With this class of men the sober, industrial people of this country have no sympathy, but from them the danger comes. To this dangerous and revolutionary class must be added the criminal classes in our great cities. The moment that the red flag of destruction is raised by the communists or the anarchists they will be joined by the criminal classes. It is well for Senators to look this thing square in the face and not put it behind them. I repeat that with this class of men the honest, industrious people of this country have no sympathy. They desire that their schemes shall not prevail; and I believe it to be a slander upon our industrial citizens, upon our real workingmen, to say that they do not desire an army able and ready to take care of communism and anarchism which has been imported here from foreign shores.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 3998) for the relief of Susan A. Wamack, administratrix of the estate of Stephen M. Farish, deceased; and

A bill (H. R. 4493) to amend the act of June 15, 1844, and for other purposes.

RELATIONS BETWEEN THE SENATE AND EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolutions reported by Mr. EDMUNDS from the Committee on the Judiciary February 18, expressing the sense of the Senate on the refusal of the Attorney-General to send copies of certain papers.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the resolutions under consideration are reported by the Committee on the Judiciary in the following words:

Resolved, That the foregoing report of the Committee on the Judiciary be agreed to and adopted.

Resolved, That the Senate hereby expresses its condemnation of the refusal of the Attorney-General, under whatever influence, to send to the Senate copies of papers called for by its resolution of the 25th of January, and set forth in the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, as in violation of his official duty and subversive of the fundamental principles of the Government and of a good administration thereof.

Resolved, That it is, under these circumstances, the duty of the Senate to refuse its advice and consent to proposed removals of officers the documents and papers in reference to the supposed official or personal misconduct of whom are withheld by the Executive or any head of a Department when deemed necessary by the Senate and called for in considering the matter.

Resolved, That the provision of section 1754 of the Revised Statutes declaring—

"That persons honorably discharged from the military or naval service by reason of disability resulting from wounds or sickness incurred in the line of duty, shall be preferred for appointments to civil offices, provided they are found to possess the business capacity necessary for the proper discharge of the duties of such office"— ought to be faithfully and fully put in execution, and that to remove, or to propose to remove, any such soldier, whose faithfulness, competency, and character are above reproach, and to give place to another who has not rendered such service, is a violation of the spirit of the law, and of the practical gratitude the people and Government of the United States owe to the defenders of constitutional liberty and the integrity of the Government.

In consequence of a misconception of the distinction which exists, and has always been maintained by the Senate, between the legislative functions of the Senate and what are termed its executive functions, which seems to have misled the Senator from Wisconsin, and may mislead others, it is proper to call attention to the fact that the Senate can not, under its rules, consider any legislative business while it is in executive session.

This fact is enough to show that the direction of the Senate to the Attorney-General, given in executive session, that he should produce papers relating to an office or to an officer, could only relate to a question of removal or suspension from office or the appointment of some person to an office. The Attorney-General could not fail to observe this fact and to note this distinction.

Perhaps I could not more distinctly present the peculiar character of an executive session than by reading Rule I, relating to such sessions:

When the President of the United States shall meet the Senate in the Senate Chamber for the consideration of executive business, he shall have a seat on the right of the presiding officer. When the Senate shall be convened by the President of the United States to any other place, the presiding officer of the Senate and the Senators shall attend at the place appointed, with the necessary officers of the Senate.

That rule followed a resolution of the Senate adopted in what is its earliest session, the 21st of August, 1789, which I will not read, this rule being simply a restatement of the language contained in that resolution; but that rule was doubtless adopted to meet a message which General Washington sent to the Senate of the United States in the following words:

Gentlemen of the Senate:

The President of the United States will meet the Senate in the Senate Chamber at half past 11 o'clock to-morrow, to advise with them on the terms of the treaty to be negotiated with the Southern Indians.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

NEW YORK, August 21, 1789.

It thus appears that General Washington almost immediately after his inauguration, coinciding with the Senate in respect to his powers, felt it to be his right and his duty to convene the Senate in extraordinary executive session, secret session, for the purpose of advising and consulting with them in regard to a treaty that was being negotiated with an Indian tribe of the South.

The President, under this rule, is recognized as having the power to call us from this Chamber, and convene us in executive session at another place, and he sits with us, on the right hand of the President of the Senate, when he chooses to visit the Senate in its executive sessions. What questions we may ask him while this confidential and peculiar relation exists, or what questions he may ask us while we are so in meeting with him, is a delicate matter. Could we properly ask him a question in such a meeting that we could not compel a Senator to answer?

When the Senate is in executive session considering a nomination can the Senate compel a Senator to answer this question and produce the documents it calls for: "Have you in your custody any paper, sent you by any person, addressed to you as a Senator of the United States, that relates to the conduct in office of A B, who was suspended or removed by the President? If so, produce it." We have no rule that gives us that power over the conscience and conduct of a Senator. The attempt to enforce such a rule would either fill up the jails with Senators after the powers of the writ of habeas corpus had been exhausted, or it would produce the sort of dissolution of the Senate which Mr. Webster declared might occur, and for which there is no known remedy, the continuing absence of a quorum to do business.

May we ask the President this question I have stated, when he joins us in executive session, if we can not compel a Senator to answer it? If such a question is asked him and an answer is refused, or his privilege is pleaded to it, can we keep our oaths while we declare that we will never more obey his summons to meet him in extraordinary executive session? And yet that is the substance of this resolution.

This is not an irrelevant case that I am supposing. General Washington when President met the Senate when in executive session, and held conferences with them in person. Why may not Mr. Cleveland meet us? The notes of request we send him, because he is not with us, are only convenient substitutes for the oral questions we could or might ask him if he were present with us. What we can properly demand of him in the one case we may in the other, and what we can not compel a Senator to answer we could not properly ask the President to state.

To get a clearer view of the character of our relations with the President in our executive functions, as we call them, let us suppose that he is present with the Senate, not on trial, as he is now under these resolutions, but is seeking advice and asking counsel. We open one of those cases where he has removed an officer, or has suspended him, and asks our advice and consent to the appointment of a person in his place. Scandals have found their way into the Senate as to one or both of the parties, and the Senate is compelled to hear and consider them, and must take an unwilling part in a controversy that is to destroy one man's character, and, possibly, make a comfortable place for another. Instead of asking him to withdraw a nomination that is unfit to be made, or to restore a man who has been unjustly removed, we claim the right to hold him to the record he has made and demand an explanation of him. We put him on trial for an act of injustice, and with caustic criticism we accuse him of insincerity. Giving him no credit for honest motives, and to prove his bias, a Senator suggests that some trusting friend of the President has sent him a false and scandalous statement addressed to him as President, so that it has all the earmarks of an official document, which he can contribute to the list of scandals, and it is demanded of him.

He prefers not to betray what his friend, who is also an official of high grade, has told him. His self-respect forbids that he should become a purveyor of scandalous or criminal accusations, even though they may have influenced his judgment in an official act, and he declines the request. The Senate insists, demanding its right to know everything, good and bad, that has been said to the President or written to him concerning the fitness for office of the person suspended or removed.

Would we take it kindly of the President if he should say to us, the matter you call for is not material to anything you have a right to consider, and I am not bound to infect the Senate with statements that decency forbids me to include in a message or to contribute to this disgusting inquiry anything that will nauseate the whole country.

This demand upon the Attorney-General is now being discussed in the open legislative session of the Senate, and if, to meet the serious attack made upon him by the Committee on the Judiciary, he were to send in here the papers which the Republican enemies of Mr. Duskin are charged with having filed against him, the Senate would instantly close its doors to keep the people from hearing what the Senate knows already, but wishes to compel the President to send to them in official form.

I am the firm friend of secret executive sessions, because the safety, decency, and peace of society require that very much that we are compelled to ascertain and discuss about men should never be heard of in the public deliberations of the Senate of the United States.

It is an unwelcome and often a trying and disgusting duty we must perform in hearing accusations of crime and immorality against men in office or men seeking for office. Our methods of trial are almost entirely ex parte; the evidence we hear is almost exclusively second-hand or hearsay testimony; and malice in its most vicious forms often lurks into the darkness of this Chamber in order to defame the innocent. If we should open the doors and hear and decide upon all the accusations that reach the Senate, we would oftentimes consign a man to infamy by a prejudgment, or force the courts to try him for offenses, with the judgment of the Senate against him, on an ex parte hearing. It would be a cruel decree against the public peace, the security of character, and against public decency that would uncover to the world all that must be uncovered to the Senate in the performance of a duty assigned to us by the Constitution we are sworn to support.

I remember that during the last session of Congress nine Republicans from Alabama were rejected by the Senate for important offices in close succession. How did the Senate find out so much more about these men than the President knew when he nominated them? Not by information gathered from him. If it is remembered that for more than fifteen years the few white Republicans in Alabama had been chiefly engaged in loading upon the Senate accusations and counter-accusations against each other, it will not be surprising that the Senate found out a great many things about them "above what was written" to the President. If the Senate were bound to communicate to the people what they claim that the President is bound to communicate to the Senate, the Republican leaders in Alabama would probably be startled with the intimate knowledge that their brethren professed to have of their character and conduct, and would be astonished at the enterprise of Senate committees in finding out the secret things of the character and conduct of men. Let us never do this necessary and disagreeable duty in open sessions of the Senate. If we can not avoid it, if we must perform it let us draw around us the veil of seclusion, if not for the Senate, for the benefit of the peace and welfare and decency of the country.

Let us give to the Senate and the President the sort of safeguard and restraint also that the courts employ in the protection of grand juries and traverse juries; and let us protect the President, his advisers and informants, against the forced revelation of the facts upon which he removes a man from office, as we protect witnesses and grand jurors from the dangers to them and to the public welfare which would arise from the disclosure of their votes in charging powerful men or powerful bands of conspirators with great crimes. The wise decree of public policy is that no man has the right to require of a public officer information of a fact the publication of which will injure the State, unless the fact is essential to the performance of some duty to the State which he is bound to render in obedience to the Constitution or the law.

I have a far greater concern for the attitude in which the Senate will be placed if these resolutions are adopted than I have in regard to the effect upon the administration or the country that will follow the utterance of a mere indignant censure upon the Attorney-General or the President. They will not suffer, either in their feelings or character, from the mere satire of the Senate, nor because they can not agree with the Senate on questions arising out of a difference as to their respective constitutional powers or privileges. Still more harmless will the lampoon be to them when it is plain that it is designed as a party exploit to gain a possible political advantage.

But the Senate is asked, in order to give a color of seriousness to this effort to lay another basis for future assaults on the Executive, to place on record for all time to come a charge against the Attorney-General, which asserts in effect that he, not being ignorant of the law or the Constitution, and not being sheltered by the authority of the President, who he claims has a right to direct him as the custodian of the papers that are called for, has willfully and knowingly violated his official duty in a manner that is subversive of the Government; and, as the proper means for the redress of this wrong, the Senate is asked to come to the further resolution that it will obstruct the Government by refusing to recognize that there is a vacancy in an office when it is asked by the President to consent that he may fill it by appointment.

I fail to perceive how it can be the duty of the Senate to do a gross wrong to the country because it may believe that the President has done a wrong to the Senate. As well might the Senate, in a fit of passion, declare all official intercourse with the President at an end as to declare that it will not consider his recommendation of a certain class of appointments until he gives his reasons for making certain removals or suspensions from office.

Whether the second resolution of the committee is intended as a method of impeachment of the Attorney-General by a power in the Senate that is not strong enough to convict him of a high crime or misdemeanor in office but is strong enough to cause the Senate to declare him guilty and to place the declaration on its records as a perpetual brand on his character, I can only judge from the attempt that was made, under the same statute, to impeach President Johnson because he removed Mr. Stanton without consulting the Senate. I will read two of the articles on which he was tried, that it may be seen how perfectly identical they are with the complaint made against the Attorney-General in the report and resolutions before the Senate:

ARTICLE II.

That on the said twenty-first day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-eight, at Washington, in the District of Columbia, said Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, unmindful of the high duties of his office, of his oath of office, and in violation of the Constitution of the United States, and contrary to the provisions of an act entitled "An act regulating the tenure of certain civil offices," passed March second, eighteen hundred and sixty-seven, without the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, said Senate then and there being in session, and without authority of law, did, with intent to violate the Constitution of the United States, and the act aforesaid, issue and deliver to one Lorenzo Thomas a letter of authority in substance as follows, that is to say:

"EXECUTIVE MANSION,
"Washington, D. C., February 21, 1868.

"SIR: Hon. Edwin M. Stanton having been this day removed from office as Secretary for the Department of War, you are hereby authorized and empowered to act as Secretary of War ad interim, and will immediately enter upon the discharge of the duties pertaining to that office.

"Mr. Stanton has been instructed to transfer to you all the records, books, papers, and other public property now in his custody and charge.

"Respectfully, yours,

"ANDREW JOHNSON.

"To Bvt. Maj. Gen. LORENZO THOMAS,
"Adjutant-General United States Army,
"Washington, D. C."

Then and there being no vacancy in said office of Secretary for the Department of War, whereby said Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, did then and there commit and was guilty of a high misdemeanor in office.

No corrupt intent is charged here, no evil purpose is charged, nothing that imputes to Mr. Johnson any intention corruptly to violate the Constitution of the United States or to deny the efficiency of the tenure-of-office act, but merely the naked fact that he had done certain things which were not consistent with the Constitution, the doing of which violated the fundamental law of the United States.

The ninth article is a mere elaboration of the same idea, and is a count in that bill of indictment which also omits any reference to corrupt purposes or intents. It is in these words:

ARTICLE IX.

That said Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, on the twenty-second day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-eight, at Washington, in the District of Columbia, in disregard of the Constitution and the laws of the United States, duly enacted, as Commander-in-Chief of the Army of the United States, did bring before himself then and there William H. Emory, a major-general by brevet in the Army of the United States, actually in command of the Department of Washington and the military forces thereof, and did then and there, as such Commander-in-Chief, declare to and instruct said Emory that part of a law of the United States, passed March second, eighteen hundred and sixty-seven, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June thirtieth, eighteen hundred and sixty-eight, and for other purposes," especially the second section thereof, which provides, among other things, that "all orders and instructions relating to military operations, issued by the President or Secretary of War, shall be issued through the General of the Army, and, in case of his inability, through the next in rank," was unconstitutional, and in contravention of the commission of said Emory, and which said provision of law had been therefore duly and legally promulgated by general orders for the government and direction of the Army of the United States, as the said Andrew Johnson then and there well knew, with intent thereby to induce said Emory, in his official capacity as commander of the Department of Washington, to violate the provisions of said act, and to take and receive, act upon and obey such orders as he, the said Andrew Johnson, might make and give, and which should not be issued through the General of the Army of the United States, according to the provisions of said act and with the further intent thereby to enable him, the said Andrew Johnson, to prevent the execution of the act entitled "An act regulating the tenure of certain civil offices," passed March second, eighteen hundred and sixty-seven, and to unlawfully prevent Edwin M. Stanton, then being Secretary for the Department of War, from holding said office and discharging the duties thereof, whereby said Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, did then and there commit, and was guilty of a high misdemeanor in office.

And the House of Representatives, by protestation, saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting at any time hereafter any further articles, or other accusation or impeachment against the said Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, and also of replying to his answers which he shall make unto the articles herein preferred against him, and of offering proof to the same, and every part thereof, and to all and every other article, accusation, or impeachment which shall be exhibited by them, as the case shall require, do demand that the said Andrew Johnson may be put to answer the high crimes and misdemeanors in office herein charged against him, and that such proceedings, examinations, trials, and judgment may be thereupon had and given as may be agreeable to law and justice.

The Committee on the Judiciary seem to have carefully avoided the expression of an opinion whether or not the Attorney-General could be or should be impeached for this alleged offense. Why, I do not know. Why, that committee will be held to account at least before the lawyers of the world. They give the facts, and formulate the charge, and ask a vote, and if he is condemned, to use the language of the resolution, it rests in their mercy and forbearance to say whether he was convicted of stupidity or crime. If Andrew Johnson had been convicted of the like charge, for subverting the same law, the world knows only too well what would have been his fate.

There seems to be some imperious will that waits upon this law, that, with ceaseless industry, presses the maimed and crippled remnant of its former power always to the front in the constant warfare upon the constitutional powers of the President. It was subdued for a time under the frown of General Grant, but the Committee on the Judiciary seem to have nurtured it in its exile with fond care, and are again ready to renew the dynastic war, that shall at last determine which is the stronger power, the tenure-of-office act or the executive department of the United States.

The third resolution reported to the Senate from the Committee on the Judiciary proposes the form and method of action that the Senate is invited to take in every case of nomination to office by the President, where the predecessor of the nominee has been suspended and the President has declined to furnish to the Senate certain evidence as to his conduct in office. The resolution proposed is retaliatory and obstructive. It is that the Senate will not perform a plain constitutional duty in passing upon a nomination sent to them because the President has refused to perform an alleged duty toward the Senate about the suspension or removal of another person from office.

Stating this attitude of the Senate in the way that is most favorable to our pretensions it can not be justified. The President has no power to prevent the Senate from performing its constitutional duty in this respect otherwise than by withholding nominations; and the Senate has no power to prevent the President from performing his duty otherwise than by refusing to consider nominations or by rejecting them. In either case each party would be at fault, and in all such controversies the country is left to suffer.

Whatever the President may do, let the Senate do their plain duty and rely upon the House of Representatives to impeach him if he refuses to perform his sworn duty to "preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution."

A rule of the Senate, based on the resolution the committee have recommended, would, under the circumstances stated in the resolution, forbid a Senator to move for the ratification of a nomination sent in by the President by declaring such a motion to be out of order; and no exigency of public necessity could even be explained by a Senator in support of the duty of prompt action by the Senate without unanimous consent of the body. Now that we are in open session and are considering this novel proposition, I wish the country to distinctly understand that when we are hereafter in secret session we can not keep the Government in a due course of action and administration, because the majority will not permit us. I wish to appeal to the people in advance for their favorable judgment on our conduct, which is forestalled by this resolution of the Senate, before we get to work in our secret struggles, when the light is excluded.

As our action on these resolutions is entirely ex parte, and as the line of conduct we propose to follow is a matter that concerns the Senate and their responsibility to the country, our duty becomes supreme that we shall first of all ascertain and declare the nature and extent of our own powers before we determine that the President has encroached upon them or refused a proper obedience to them. Does the report of the Committee on the Judiciary and the resolutions they submit declare that the Senate possesses the constitutional power to prevent the President from removing a person from office, or that a law of Congress which is valid under the Constitution gives to the Senate that power?

I find in the report and resolutions an implied assumption of both or either of these positions, but no bold and unequivocal declaration of either.

The committee thought it best not to enter into definitions of the powers of the Senate, but to argue adroitly and learnedly, exhausting selected paragraphs of history for favorable precedents, and then to agree together quickly upon conclusions. They were evidently afraid of definitions. The conclusions they reached required no common agreement as to premises, nor the support of any dry methods of logic. If they were not self-evident, they were at least agreeable to the purposes of the majority of the committee, and in that sense they were self-asserting and self-supporting and commanded the assent of the majority. They are conclusions that were jumped to, not reached by the process of just reasoning. They were that the Attorney-General had committed a grave offense, which the committee failed to define or to characterize except with denunciation; that the Senate would punish this offense by an obstinate refusal to perform its own constitutional duty to the country, and that some expression which would prevent the removal from office of a Republican soldier to put a Democratic soldier in his place should be used that would reconcile the country to their desperate resolve to hold on to all the offices.

If we can not define to the intelligent comprehension of the country, and in a manner not to be misunderstood, what are the powers of the Senate under the Constitution in the removal of persons from office, we are in no condition to assert that the President has in any manner violated his duty in refusing to send to the Senate any information in his possession relating to such removals. If we can not show that the conduct of the President in some way conflicts with the powers of the Senate, that ends this whole controversy.

The Senate is the actor in this business. It is the demandant, and nothing that the President has done or said can excuse the Senate from the duty of showing that it has the right to all that has been demanded.

The Senate is bound to justify its action in this matter upon its own powers under the Constitution and not upon any admission the President may have made, if he has made any, as to the obligatory force of the tenure-of-office act, and is bound also to show that it has the right to the information demanded for the purpose that it declared, and it is bound by that declaration. When the Senate is asked by its Committee on the Judiciary to adopt the harsh and denunciatory resolutions that have just been read, we have the question forced upon us to which we can not avoid an answer, "What is the purpose that we are seeking to accomplish, and whether it is a purpose that falls within the range of duties that we are authorized to perform?"

There was a purpose for which the Committee on the Judiciary made the demand on the Attorney-General which he has refused to comply with. When that committee now appeal to the Senate to vindicate them by denouncing the Attorney-General the Senate must first examine into the purpose for which the demand was made, and whether it is one that the Senate can lawfully entertain and can execute with whatever power it possesses, or whether it relates to a matter that the Senate has no jurisdiction to control. The Senate can not vindicate the committee by resolving that the purpose for which they demanded this information was not in itself legitimate, but that there were other purposes for which, under other circumstances, it would have been legitimate, and therefore they were right in making the demand, and that we should denounce the Attorney-General for refusing the information called for by the committee.

The motives of the President in the suspension of Duskin was the actual subject of the inquiry, however ingeniously the purpose is masked by special pleading. The Committee on the Judiciary based its right to make the inquiry, not upon the right of the Senate to legislate for the benefit of the country or to gather evidence on which Duskin could be impeached or censured, but upon the ground that the Senate is empowered by the Constitution and the law to prohibit the President from removing certain classes of officers, and that therefore they have the right to be informed of every fact that operated on the mind of the President in suspending Duskin from office.

If the Senate has no such power, their interference in this matter can not be justified, unless they are seeking to show that the President is guilty of some misdemeanor in office in the removal of Duskin for which he ought to be impeached. If that is the purpose, and if the Senate believes, as the committee believe, if they believe anything, and have declared in these resolutions, let the Senate order an investigation upon charges preferred by them against the Attorney-General or against the President, accusing them of a high crime or misdemeanor in office. Let them direct the committee to send for persons and papers and ascertain the facts which will show the guilt of these high officers, or else will show the grave wrong, which I hope is a mistake, of those who bring an unjust accusation in regard to a matter over which they have no jurisdiction and condemn a high officer as a criminal for denying to the Senate a power which they are eager to usurp. If the Senate must impeach and condemn an officer in an ex parte proceeding, let it at least have the courage to say that the offense is or is not impeachable.

But, sir, if we were now proceeding to try Duskin, after an investigation had been ordered by the Senate, then the important question is presented whether he was an officer of the United States or whether he was only a private citizen when the inquiry was started by the Senate. I will not quote the decision of the Senate in the case of General Belknap as one that I recognize as being unquestionable in principle or safe to follow in practice, but it seems to be a conclusive estoppel against the political party that has started this war upon the President for political purposes. General Belknap resigned his office before the House could prefer articles of impeachment against him, and the Senate held that he was not in office when the articles were sent to the Senate, but was only a private citizen, and could not therefore be held liable to impeachment.

My colleague [Mr. PUGH], in his able argument on these resolutions, pointed out the fact that Mr. Duskin's commission had expired, and he also had become a private citizen before the Committee on the Judiciary had made any inquiry about his conduct in office. But that committee had no thought of reaching Mr. Duskin, and that conclusive fact in the case entirely escaped their notice in their eagerness to reach Mr. Garland, and through him the President. If the world dared to do such an irreverent thing as to smile at the blunders of so grave a body, this faux pas would excuse a universal outburst of merriment at their expense. There was another fact, quite as important, and of even stronger bearing on this case and on the pretension of the Senate to share with the President in his power to remove persons from office, which is, that George M. Duskin held no valid commission after the President suspended him.

If Mr. Duskin's commission in office is no longer of sufficient strength to bind him to the Government, or the Government to him, as a part of "the state of the Union," as the Senator from Vermont thinks he is, it may be logically assumed that even the zeal of the Senator would not lead him to inquire whether his record in office was good or bad. The Senator wants to know what is the present "state of the Union," not what it was or might have been. Such an inquiry would be quite pertinent in reference to Duskin as it would be about any other historical character who had died in office during the Presidency of George Washington. Mr. Duskin's relations with the office he held were severed the moment he was put out and Mr. Burnett was put in, whether the act of the President which put him out is to be called a suspension under the statute or a removal under the Constitution.

The Constitution provides that "the President shall commission all the officers of the United States." Until a man is commissioned and sworn he is not an officer of the United States. The commission is the patent, the muniment of title to the office which completes the appointment. An office is an entirety, in which but one person can be commissioned at the same time. The unity and entirety of an office is even more strongly the doctrine of our Constitution than it was of the common law. This fact appears in the many provisions that disqualify persons from holding more than one office at the same time, even though the commissions were issued by different governments; as, for example, from the several States and the United States. It still more clearly appears from the prohibition on the appointment of members of Congress to civil offices created during the time for which they were elected. It appears most distinctly, however, from the fact that the Constitution requires that every officer of the United States shall hold a commission from the President. The right of the officer to the commission is complete when his appointment is complete, and he may then have a legal remedy to have the commission delivered to him. So long as no other appointment is made that right remains. It is a property right, which can only be destroyed by death, resignation, or removal, or by the abolition of the office. The commission describes and identifies the office and the person who is appointed to it, and distinguishes the office from every other office and the person who is entitled to hold it from every other person. The commission is made a sine qua non of the office by the Constitution, so that the officer and the public may have conclusive evidence of his rights and his authority.

The President can not commission two persons to different offices in the same instrument, nor can he commission two persons by the same instrument to hold the same office. Neither can he commisson two persons in separate instruments both of whom are to hold the same office at the same time. Whoever holds the commission of the President of the United States, under a lawful appointment, is an officer of the United States, and he fills the particular office to which he is assigned. The power to commission temporary substitutes in civil offices where there is no vacancy in the offices but the persons appointed and commissioned are still in office, does not exist under the Constitution and can not be conferred by law upon the President. Otherwise the President could issue any number of commissions in succession and keep such persons commissioned in the same office at the same time. He could compel the Senate to agree or disagree to such appointment in turn under the tenure-of-office act, because it displaced the person who stood next before him on the list. A person appointed in the place of a suspended officer can no more be displaced by another appointee without the consent of the Senate than the man who is first suspended; and yet under this law, as contended for by the committee, the President may suspend as many as may come into office under his appointment and neither ask the consent of the Senate as to the appointment or suspension or removal of any but the first man that he undertook to displace. If Duskin were now in full possession of the legal rights conferred on him by his appointment and commission, as the Senator from Vermont contends he is, the successive suspension and removal of a dozen Democratic substitutes for him by the President would still leave the only question before the Senate whether it would consent to Duskin's suspension or removal. The rest of the cases, with all the horrible slaughter of character and the wounds to their feelings, would be consigned to oblivion or to that bourn to which the Senator from Vermont thinks all Democrats should be sent because they were Democratic victims of a Democratic President, while the Senate would be aroused to a frenzy of indignation in its anxiety to take care of the honor and rights and feelings of Duskin, the Republican, the first man suspended.

In this case Duskin would doubtless be amazed that so small a tincture of legitimate Republican blood as he could contribute from his veins would make red the sea of salt tears that are being shed over his wrongs. He would turn pale with anguish when he read the last resolution about the duty of filling the offices with Union soldiers, and reflected that he had spent the earlier years of his early manhood in the confederate volunteer service, where he won by far the highest honors of his life, which he afterward sacrificed in his affiliation with carpet-bag Republicans, such as Paul Strobach.

It was after Congress found that they could not control President Johnson in the discretionary exercise of his powers under the Constitution that they devised the tenure-of-office act of 1867 as a plan by which they could limit those powers otherwise than by abolishing the offices. These acts impliedly confessed the inability of the Senate to revoke commissions issued by the President. These commissions stood across the road to this usurpation by the Senate and could not be removed, and so they were declared as being irrevocable by the President and that they could only be suspended, and the officers were declared to be in abeyance until the Senate should either consent or refuse its consent to the appointment of the substitute or some other person in the place of the officer thus placed in coventry.

All this meant neither more nor less than the repeal by Congress of the President's constitutional right to remove persons from office.

There was never a plan devised by which the Constitution was more successfully subverted, or one where the danger to it was so well concealed under the guise of giving the direction of the law to the executive power for the better administration of its duties.

When General Grant became President all was changed. The people, through the House of Representatives, demanded that their favorite and trusted President should not wear the fetters that had been forged for Andrew Johnson, and the House speedily sent to the Senate a bill to repeal the tenure-of-office act.

The Senate yielded the substance in order to retain the shadow. It gave up its sword on condition that it should be still permitted to wear the scabbard on dress parade.

This war is again renewed against the President's constitutional power to revoke commissions issued by him and to remove persons from office with the same great and inveterate general in command. The Senator from Vermont still leads the assaulting column. This time the assault does not come from a great party with enough votes in each House to overcome the President's veto.

It does not come with the power to return the tenure-of-office act to the citadel from which General Grant drove it, and so, instead of demanding its restoration to the statute-book, a party caucus of a feeble majority in the Senate attacks the discretionary method of exercising discretionary powers that are affirmed in the Senate's amendment of 1869 to that act with an arrogant but apparently empty resolution.

They criticise the Attorney-General as the self-confessed servant of the President, without explaining that it is not his duty to make appointments or removals from the office of district attorney of the United States, but that it is the duty of the President; and that in whatever concerns that duty it is under his control.

Over the shoulders of the Attorney-General they attempt to inflict upon the President the scourge of their hot indignation, and then complain that he has so far mistaken the issue as to suppose that he had any interest in the matter.

The Senator from Vermont is not given to playing at mock heroics. He never makes a shot that he does not believe will reach the vitals of his foe. It would ill befit him, and would offend against his tastes, to parade in a holiday tournament as the grim commander-in-chief of a sham battle.

This fierce assault upon the Attorney-General would have been, as a logical necessity, a movement to impeach him, if that committee had power to do more than to express their convictions in resolutions. The committee can never avoid the conclusion that upon the facts and premises stated by them they were bound as a body of constitutional lawyers to have articles of impeachment brought against the Attorney-General for the crime which they allege against him in that resolution and undertake to support by the facts that are in their report. They can be illogical if they choose; but they can not be unjust without having the attitude which they have voluntarily assumed exposed, I will say, sir, to the scrutiny, if not worse, of the whole world.

Can any man deny that the Senate, as a court of impeachment, could condemn an Attorney-General for conduct in office violative of the fundamental laws of the United States, such as is charged in the second resolution, and for that cause remove him from office after finding him guilty? It seems to me that no lawyer can doubt that the offense charged against the Attorney-General in these resolutions is a high crime or misdemeanor, if it is any offense.

I am very far from denying to the Senate the right and duty of investigating and exposing any conduct of an officer of the United States that is in violation of and is subversive of its constitutional powers. But when the Senate is convinced that such an offense has been committed its duty rises to the dignity of the subject and compels it to lay the facts before the House for its constitutional action and abstain from rendering judgment of condemnation in advance of a trial. If we assume that the House is partisan and will not do its duty, we expose the Senate to a worse category when, for that or any other cause, we ignore the constitutional remedy and indulge in formulating in mere resolutions our accusations, followed by our deliberate sentence of condemnation without a trial, and then follow that with an appeal to the passions and prejudices of a political party.

The Senate makes, first, the real and fundamental issue with the President that he has not the discretionary power either to suspend or remove a person from office without the consent of the Senate. He claims that he has that power and will not surrender it to the Senate. The Senate calls for information to enable them to exercise a power that the President denies that they possess, and this is the secondary or side issue in this question.

If we can not defend the alleged prerogative of the Senate upon the basis of the Constitution, let us say so, and let us not attempt to evade it by taking the ground that in any event the President must inform the Senate, not Congress, as the language of the Constitution is, of the state of the Union, and that Mr. Duskin, suspended, forms one distinct "drop in the bucket" to make up the state of the Union, as the Senator from Vermont artistically puts it.

President Washington answered the House conclusively and forever when it made a like demand for the inside facts touching the negotiation of a treaty. He held that they had the right to construe the treaty for themselves, as they would any other law, but they had no right to know his private reasons for asking the Senate to join him in its adoption or the facts considered in the negotiation.

The courts would be bound in a suit brought by or against Duskin, as the Senate is, to accept the act of the President in removing him, if within his constitutional province, as conclusive; just as the courts would be bound to accept the statute as conclusive against Duskin in cutting off his salary if that was enacted within the constitutional province of the powers of Congress. That much faith and credit must be given by every department of the Government to the acts of every other department, which it has no right to annul or reverse. Faith and credit are living principles in our Constitution.

Public acts as well as records and judicial proceedings are required to be received with "full faith and credit" by every State in Article IV of the Constitution. This public faith requires us to accept the public acts of all Departments with full credit that they have been honestly done until the contrary appears, and that they have been rightly performed, if they are within the powers conferred upon the State or a Department of the United States. This presumption of honesty and good faith attends every lawful act of every Department everywhere. The judgment of a court can not be collaterally assailed for fraud in its rendition. The cases are few where this may be done, even in a direct proceeding before a competent court. A patent can not be attacked collaterally for fraud in its procurement, because full faith and credit must be given to the honesty of the act of the officer who issued it.

When the Senate is considering a nomination to office, and, as collateral to that question, chooses to consider the reasons that induced the President to remove somebody else from the same office, will it deny to the act of the President full faith and credit, and assume to itself the power to assail his act by a direct proceeding and to set it aside and annul it? It must do this if it would open to examination the question whether he acted honestly in making the removal.

The Senate has the power to consider a nomination sent to it by the President. In doing this it acts directly and conclusively on the subject. It settles the question, and sends the result to the President as being conclusive on him. He is bound to give it full faith and credit, without any inquiry as to whether the Senate had good motives or sufficient evidence to warrant its action. The Senate has no power to consider a removal from office made by the President, except in a collateral and inconclusive way; and it rests with him to say whether he will or will not inform the Senate of the reasons for his action or as to the facts upon which he based his action. To my judgment it is a clear proposition that the President has a definite grant of power in the Constitution to remove persons from office; while the Senate has no more authority over participating in that act or to reverse it than the House of Representatives or the Supreme Court have. I will proceed, as briefly as the nature of the proposition will admit, to state the reasons which force me to this conclusion.

The question of power as between the President and the Senate is the same whether the officer is displaced by suspension or removal. In either case the question is whether the Senate can, under the Constitution or under any law, prevent the President from displacing an unfit person from office.

I claim that the President derives his power to remove persons from office from one express and direct grant in section 1, Article II, of the Constitution, and that none of this power and none of the right to exercise it in any case is borrowed either from the advice or the consent of the Senate or from the statutes under discussion.

When the constitutional convention was considering the framework of this great Government it took up each subject that was regulated by the British constitution and made further modifications of each, so as to adapt it to the plan and principles of our Government. Our revolt was not against the British constitution, but against British rule and against all foreign rule. We claimed and appropriated every guarantee of liberty and every restraint upon licentious power that was claimed in Magna Charta or in any feature of the British constitution, and added to them others which God gave us the honor of consecrating to the world in the name of constitutional liberty, put them into a written constitution, and guarded that with an oath that rests in solemn sanction upon the heart of every one who takes a part in the Government, and in spirit upon the heart of every citizen to support the Constitution.

We took the sovereignty of the king as a lawmaker and vested it in the Constitution and the laws enacted in pursuance thereof by Congress and made them supreme; that is to say, we made the Constitution supreme. We took the immortality of the crown and divided it into sections of four years, when it was to be renewed in its life by the votes of the people. We took the royal prerogatives away from the executive power and distributed them in part among the three departments by express provisions in the Constitution, leaving some to remain in the chief executive officer of the United States.

Among the powers of the royal prerogative that we thus disposed among the departments are the power to make war and peace; to raise and support armies and navies and to command them; to coin money; to create honors and offices and to appoint persons to office; to assist in enacting laws; to make treaties; to receive and protect ambassadors; to appoint ports and havens for commerce, through which it is to flow in or out, to or from the country; to erect beacons and sea-lights; to invent and issue writs, and to supply to the courts their powers and the judges their commissions, which ran originally "during the good pleasure of the king," but since 13 William III they run "during good behavior." The king prosecuted all crimes, was possessed of legal ubiquity, could do no wrong, and was "the fountain of honor, of office, and of privilege."

In this and in much more he was the executive head of the British people, and held all his powers in trust for them. His oath is not that he will obey the British constitution—although they have a constitution in Great Britain—but, that he "will govern the people of this Kingdom of England, and the dominions thereto belonging, according to the statutes in Parliament agreed on and the laws and customs of the same."

They swore him to obedience to the statutes agreed on in Parliament, because he is a constituent part of Parliament, and must give his royal sanction to every act before it can become a law. His oath is a pledge of good faith rather than of obedience, since the crown as executive could not swear to obey the crown as lawgiver.

We put the Constitution above the President and swear him to "preserve, protect, and defend" it. We do not swear him to obey the enactments of Congress, but we charge him most solemnly that he shall execute them when enacted in pursuance of the Constitution. We were careful not to burden his conscience with a positive duty, which Congress should define at its discretion, the performance of which would compel him to neglect the highest duty imposed on him by his oath, of preserving, protecting, and defending the Constitution. I will again recur to this subject before I close my remarks.

The language of the first section of Article II of the Constitution is that "the executive power shall be vested in the President of the United States of America." This is a plenary grant of the executive power, broad enough to cover every act and purpose of government that can ever require executive intervention. In these words there are no restrictions or limitations, except such as arise out of the nature or character of the executive power in a government. The restrictions and limitations of this power in the Constitution which abridge the usual signification of this broad language are to be found in the general scheme of our Government, in the express limitations on the executive power and in the express or implied grants of power to some other department of a right to control the action of the executive power in some specified way.

The framers of the Constitution were not willing to leave it to the legislative power to give to or withhold from the President such powers as it might, from time to time, judge to be proper. They wisely chose to supply the executive power fully in one comprehensive grant and in words of broad and definite signification, and to qualify and limit the extent of this grant of power, and the manner in which it should be used by the President and the purposes for which it should be employed by other express provisions which they were careful to arrange in the body of the Constitution, so as to conform this executive power to the nature of the Government they were ordaining, and to place it under all the restraints which they considered necessary for its proper efficiency and to prevent its abuse in future.

They knew that no government had existed, or could exist, without an executive head, and that the vigor of every government depended much on the powers that its executive department could exert. But they took care, with studious diligence, to check and restrain the executive power within such limits as would give security to every right of the people and of the States that the Constitution was intended to protect. It was in this form and for these reasons that the President was invested by the people with all the power necessary to the complete execution of their will in conducting their government through constitutional laws to be enacted by their legislative agents and construed by their judges.

When they vested a distinct power in the Federal Government, or in any office or department thereof, they meant that it should be supreme within its sphere of operation as limited by the Constitution as well within the borders of our own country as with respect to foreign nations. It was not intended to establish a weak and negative sort of government, such as would have been done by so distributing its powers among the three great departments that they would evenly balance each other and neutralize the efficiency of the whole, nor yet did they intend to compel one of the departments to borrow its powers from the others, from time to time, as occasion might seem to require. On the contrary, it was intended to make the Government powerful and enduring, and also to suppress jealousies and to thwart ambitious usurpations, by prescribing to each department a distinct field of duty on which the others were forbidden to encroach.

It was an indispensable feature of such a government that there should be an executive power, vested in a President; not a weak or divided power, but a power concentrated, strong, and ready to attend upon and execute every lawful requirement of every department of the Government, with the assistance of either the civil or the military agencies and authority.

The executive power is the efficient, final, and indispensable force that executes the will of the people of the United States when lawfully expressed.

It was ordained in the Constitution by the simple but all-embracing description of "the executive power," and was vested in the President by the express language of that instrument, without any resort to or dependence upon any other power for the subsequent enlargement of its definition.

It is the only one of the three great departments in which the whole grant of power is confided to a single officer, and the only one that is expressly guarded in the Constitution by a special oath of office adapted alone to that power.

The Constitution requires that the other executive officers, judicial officers, Senators and Representatives, and the members of the several State Legislatures, and all executive and judicial officers of the several States "shall be bound by oath, or affirmation, to support this Constitution." That is all the Constitution requires of them as to their oaths of office. The President's oath is:

I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will faithfully execute the office of President of the United States, and will to the best of my ability, preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States.

Can it be reasonably asserted that this oath, to "preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States," means no more and relates to no higher powers than the oath required of all other officers (including executive officers and even down to the minor officers of the States) that they will "support this Constitution?"

The President is the only officer to whom the Constitution gives in special charge these high duties by express command and binds him with the sanctions of an oath that he will faithfully discharge them. In addition to this branch of his oath, and also in subordination to it, is the other and conspicuous obligation to "faithfully execute the office of President of the United States." He is the only man in this Government who is sworn faithfully to execute a particular office. This part of his oath is not limited to such duties as may be annexed by statute to the office of President, but it includes every duty which belongs to the "executive power" which is vested in the office of President.

The powers of the office of President and the duty of faithfully executing that office were essentially as broad and as obligatory when George Washington took his oath as President as they are to-day. There was not a law upon the statute-book that was enacted under the Constitution of the United States at that time. Yet there were many valid laws of nations and of the Congress of the Confederation that remained until they were superseded by new enactments to which the executive power extended, and which he was bound faithfully to execute.

The great body of treaties we have made with foreign powers and the public and private statutes we have enacted since March 4, 1789, have added nothing to "the executive power" "vested in the President," while that has stood ready as a full and inexhaustible fountain of authority derived from the Constitution to contribute in every emergency of the Government all the civil and military direction and force that has been necessary or will ever be required to execute each law as it comes into existence.

I have dwelt upon this outline view of the executive power, as it is vested in the President by the Constitution, for the purpose of showing that the framers of that instrument, when they used the words "the executive power shall be vested in the President of the United States," had reference to a known and well-defined element of power, without which government would be impossible, and that they adopted it and vested it in the President, and swore him to execute it in subordination to and also in compliance with his oath "to preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States."

The Constitution, when it vested the executive power in the President, did not enlarge or increase the powers of that office above the range of powers that the executive heads of other governments possessed. On the contrary, it greatly limited those powers by qualifying clauses. Still it is not a matter of doubt that it was the intention of the people who ordained this Government that the President, though limited in his powers, should represent this Government as the executive head of a sovereign and self-governing people, equal in rank and power to any nation of the world. But the executive power was vested in the President for a still higher purpose, and it was guarded and modified to meet the difficulties that had appeared in the experience of our English ancestry, from whom we inherited many of our sublimest ideas of constitutional liberty.

Our purpose was to establish the fact that all just powers of government emanated from the people, and did not descend upon them as an act of grace through the divine right of kings; that the people could govern themselves with as much certainty, could protect their liberties with greater security than any crowned head could give to them, and could enforce their rights among the nations with as much authority and power as any of the greatest monarchies of the world. The omission from their plan of government of a single executive chief, fully invested with executive power, would have been fatal to the success of these great purposes.

The British constitution, while it did not supply the model of our Constitution, did suggest, as I have observed already, many of the points in the general plan which we adopted as an improvement upon the system under which the English-speaking people had grown so greatly in wisdom and power.

In Great Britain the king, the commons, and the courts had fallen into frequent and bitter antagonisms as to the scope of their respective powers. We sought to avoid this friction by means of clear definitions and of distinct restraints upon the powers of each department fixed in a written constitution that all were sworn to support. The war power, which in Great Britain belongs to the crown, we divided between Congress and the President, giving to Congress the power to declare war and the power to raise and support the Army and Navy; and to the President we gave the powers of Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy and of the militia of the States when called into actual service. This was a limitation on the executive power as it existed in Great Britain and in other governments.

In vesting the legislative power in Congress the careful precaution was used to confine it to the powers granted in the Constitution, so that it should not usurp the field of legislation reserved to the States or go beyond that which was essential to supply laws for the Government ordained in the Constitution. This is much narrower ground than was covered by the legislative power of the Parliament of Great Britain, of which the king is a constituent element. We qualified the negative of the President upon the enactment of laws by Congress so as to limit the effect of the veto power to the destruction of an enactment which is not, upon reconsideration, again passed by both Houses of Congress by a two-thirds vote in each. The King of Great Britain had an absolute veto on all acts of Parliament by refusing to assent.

We placed the President under the express injunction that he shall "take care that the laws be faithfully executed." This is not an additional grant of executive power to the President. That power had been already granted to him in the broadest terms.

This is the most powerful restraint on the power of the President, and is the one that is the most pertinent in this discussion. It is in this discussion frequently confused as being one of the terms of his oath. Does this express command to the President subordinate the executive power vested in him to the legislative powers granted to Congress and which are described in the Constitution as "all legislative powers herein granted?" Is the President bound to accept the will of Congress, as declared in a law, even though it is passed over his veto, as a conclusive judgment as to his duty to obey it, no matter what his own judgment may be as to its constitutional validity, or how far his conscience may condemn him for doing so as being faithless to his oath to "preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution?"

The acts of Congress, though they are passed over a veto of the President, are still no more than laws. They are not laws of higher sanction than those that the President has approved. They may be annulled by the decrees of the courts, as we have seen it done in notable cases, and yet there is no supremacy of the judicial over the legislative department declared in the Constitution. The supremacy comes from the nature of the jurisdiction, as the supremacy, if we may call it such, of the President comes from the nature of his powers. It has exclusive authority over all judicial determinations, and is therefore supreme. The judicial department has no jurisdiction over the political conduct of the other departments, and therefore the judicial power is not a constitutional restraint over the legislative or the executive powers in such matters. Within that field of political power these departments were left to an honest and enlightened discretion, or even to a wider range of discretion, which the people will control through the frequently recurring elections.

Impeachment affords another and most effectual remedy for a perverse defiance of law; but even that remedy is not perfect. The failure of the Senate to convict the transgressor, while a majority in both Houses may express an unqualified condemnation of the conduct complained of, exhausts the power to correct the alleged abuse. In such a case, when the President is the offender, his executive power would, as a result, override the law he was accused of setting at defiance, even though it may have been declared constitutional by the Supreme Court, and this only because less than a majority of the Senate agreed with him in the opinion that the law was in violation of the Constitution when he is put on trial upon impeachment. The Constitution interposes this protection to the President—the only officer who is sworn to protect and defend it—so that he may have a reasonable liberty of judgment as to the validity of the laws he is enjoined to faithfully execute. Here, then, is an instance in which the executive power is more potent than both the legislative and judicial power, and in which its defiance of both is upheld through the judgment of less than a majority in one of the Houses of Congress.

This is a great and just safeguard to a President whose duty of refusing to execute a law that he is convinced is unconstitutional is, in almost every instance, to be exerted against the demands of a powerful political party bent on success; or to prevent the destruction of some class of people, or their property rights, or their liberties, who are obnoxious to a dominant majority; or to prevent some organized raid upon the Treasury. It often requires much moral and physical courage in a President to sustain him in such efforts, and it was a stronghold for liberty erected in the Constitution when the President was especially charged with the duty of preserving, protecting, and defending the Constitution, and was bound by an oath to perform it faithfully.

With such responsibility it would be a solecism to say that the President shall not have freedom to choose the line of action to which his sense of duty invites him. With an Executive thus trammeled the Government would be paralyzed, while the encroachments of the legislative power would soon absorb the powers of the other departments. But the safeguard provided against the impeachment of a President by the vote of less than two-thirds of the Senate is a security that fairly balances the dangers to which he is exposed. This is illustrated in the acquittal of President Johnson and the subsequent abandonment by Congress of the principles of the law for the disregard of which he was impeached; and it is an impressive lesson to teach the country the value of the immunities provided in the Constitution for the protection of Presidents who faithfully execute their office according to their best ability and their own conscientious understanding.

It is not true, either in theory or in practice, that the President is subordinated in his executive powers to the will of Congress when the legislative will is expressed in enactments that are in violation of the Constitution. Congress is as apt to do violence to the Constitution as is the President. The President's duty to take care that the laws be faithfully executed is subordinate to his sworn obligation to "preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution." He must determine for himself, but at his peril, whether any law that he is required to execute is in violation of the Constitution.

Congress has passed many laws that were approved by Presidents, and some that were passed over the veto of Presidents, that were afterward held to be unconstitutional by the Supreme Court, and are a dead letter on the statute-book. Was the President, notwithstanding his oath to preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution, at any time bound to render obedience to and to execute these void enactments?

Will any lawyer here say that there was a moment in the official life of the President of the United States when he was bound by public policy, by comity, or by any other reasons that could affect an executive, to give his adherence to and participate in the execution of a law enacted by Congress which the Supreme Court had decided was unconstitutional? If not, the President must be left to judge for himself and upon his own responsibility whether his oath to preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution requires him to execute a law that his conscience and his judgment condemn as being in violation of the Constitution.

The executive power vested in the President is a department of the Government, and is possessed of all the constitutional authority that is requisite to enable the President to execute his office in the manner that may become essential to the preservation, protection, and defense of the Constitution.

It is Congress that always requires the aid of the President to execute its will as expressed in acts of legislation. It is seldom that Presidents are known to appeal to Congress. If the President refuses to do this, Congress can not substitute other agents to supplant the authority of the President, and thus execute its will in despite of the executive power established in the Constitution.

It is therefore incorrect, as a proposition of constitutional law, to say that the President is bound to obey a law that he believes is void for repugnance to the Constitution because it has been regularly placed upon the statute-book; and it is idle to assert such a proposition in the face of the fact that Congress can not by a law displace the President and substitute another agent to execute its will.

The deductions to be drawn from the adjustments between the legislative and executive powers as arranged in the Constitution are all against the idea that a mere majority in Congress can control the action of the executive power so as to substitute the will of the Congress for the judgment of the President in matters that relate to the constitutional powers and duties of his office.

Every bill and resolution must be submitted to the President for his approval before it can become a law. If he disapproves the measure on any ground, a vote of two-thirds of each House is required to give to it the effect of a law. But such a vote does not by any means remove any unconstitutional taint from the measure.

Thus we see that in the enactment of laws, which is nearly the whole of the power confided to the legislative department, the Constitution, in the most careful way, subordinates the will of a mere majority in the Houses to the will of the President, however capricious or unpatriotic that will may be, or whether the question on which he disagrees with Congress is a question of mere policy or is one of constitutional law.

But it was not safe, nor would it have been wise, that the executive power that was vested in the President should be left without the many strong restraints and limitations that were expressly mentioned and arranged in the Constitution and were also expressly placed within the obligations of his oath. They were accordingly provided in the body of the Constitution in careful terms, so as not to confine the executive power to the subjects enumerated in these restrictive provisions, but to leave it free within the scheme and purposes of the Constitution to answer to the almost infinite variety of occasions that must arise to require its exercise in a government so great and so complex as ours.

The executive power is also further restrained as to the treaty-making powers. The advice and consent of two-thirds of the Senate is made essential to the validity of a treaty negotiated by the President. The king alone was the treaty-making power in Great Britain, and the well understood fact that the executive power was then recognized by all the powers of the world as the treaty-making power in all governments made it necessary that we should place this express limitation upon the executive power vested in the President.

"The executive power" in Great Britain included the power to prorogue Parliament or to dissolve it and issue writs of election for a new house of commons. We negatived the right of the executive power to dissolve either the Senate or House of Representatives by fixing definite terms of office for the members of the respective Houses. This was a limitation on the executive power. We also gave the President the right to assemble either House on extraordinary occasions. We also gave him the power to adjourn Congress in case the Houses disagreed as to an adjournment, and to require them to meet again at a time to be designated by him. This is our substitute for the power to prorogue the National Legislature, limited to a certain condition, namely: That the Houses shall have declared an adjournment necessary, but shall have disagreed as to the time of adjournment. Here is another limitation on the "executive power vested in the President," as that power was recognized and understood by the people who ordained our Constitution.

The union of the civil and military power under the supreme direction of the President, as the national Executive, was made the subject of express ordination in the Constitution for several reasons.

The sacredness of the persons of all supreme rulers was at that time a maxim recognized and enforced in all existing governments. The king could do no wrong, but his ministers must suffer vicariously for what was wrongdoing in the government. The idea of the personal sanctity of the chief executive we discarded. We made him expressly amenable to impeachment and punishment, and subordinated his ministers and all executive officers to his control, so that his responsibility should be personal and undivided.

Another great point in which we made a new departure was in placing the military power in direct subordination to the civil power. No great general, however powerful or ambitious, can usurp, unless at the peril of his life, the supreme executive power vested in the President for a fixed term. His Commander-in-Chief, the President, is, by his military rank and power, provided with the means to destroy him speedily and utterly, or to arrest and confine him, and to degrade him from his command. No better security could have been provided against a military usurper than this; and no one subject was more carefully considered by our people when they were framing the organic law of this great and powerful Republic. The President, being already in possession of the executive power, could not increase it by any military adventure, since he is amenable to impeachment, to punishment, and to removal from office, and to disqualification for office for any crime or high misdemeanors in office, whether in his civil or military character. Thus arose the necessity for giving to the President this twofold character as the chief civil and military executive. This was a limitation also on the executive power as it was known to other governments, since it subordinated the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy to the final judgment of the civil powers of the Government and to removal from office.

The power to commission all the officers of the Government of the United States belongs only to the President. This is the power conservative of all the executive powers vested in the President. It was given to him in order to prevent the interposition by any other department of any officer or agent who might be charged with any duty of an executive nature, and to prevent insubordination in any branch of the service, and to prevent the friction that would arise from his removing officers who held their commissions under any other department of the Government. No greater security than this could be given to the President against any interference by another department with the executive power vested in him, and no greater security could have been provided for a peaceful and efficient government.

If these are correct views of the nature and extent of the executive power vested in the President, the task is a light one to determine how far this power has been limited by the provisions of the Constitution relating to appointments to office and by the absence of any provision relating to removals from office.

In the absence of any other provision in the Constitution, the "executive power vested in the President" would necessarily include the right and duty of making appointments to office and removals from office. This being necessary to give the Government any actual life, force, or vigor, the President could not "execute his office" if he could not assign to the other offices their incumbents. But the Constitution does expressly provide for appointments to office, and by its terms and careful arrangements it limits "the executive power vested in the President" by confining his power of appointment to such persons as the Senate, by a majority vote, shall "advise and consent" that he shall appoint.

The President selects and nominates the candidate. The Senate determines whether he is fit for the place, and whether his appointment would be agreeable to that body. If he is found fully eligible the President can then proceed to appoint him, or he can, in his discretion, decline to appoint him. The evident purpose of this arrangement was to give to the country the best-qualified men to fill the offices; and the means provided are quite sufficient for that object.

Another influential reason for placing this check on "the executive power" was to break the force of the political power that the President might concentrate in the advancement of his personal fortunes or high ambitions.

It was a most wise and excellent arrangement which provided for the interposition of the Senate, that it might divide with the President the power arising from the bestowal of office, and that it might defeat him in any selfish personal use of his great powers. As it turns out in our history, this divided agency in the bestowal of the offices whose salaries and perquisites call for such immense sums annually is the most important barrier and the safest that could have been interposed between the Treasury and the great political parties that seem now to have organized as the actual ruling powers in the United States.

The subject of removals from office was not omitted from the anxious solicitude of the framers of the Constitution, but no mention is made of it, because it was clearly included in the executive power vested in the President. The judiciary were carefully removed beyond the reach of this power by having a fixed tenure of office prescribed in the Constitution—during good behavior. The power to remove an incumbent from office is unquestionably an executive power. None but an executive officer can enforce it to a practical result. It implies the active exertion of force, when force is needed, to dispossess an incumbent of the office he holds and of the custody of property and records under his control. Neither the Senate nor Congress can execute an order to dispossess an impeached President of his office without resorting to the executive powers of his successor. A decree upon paper, no matter by what authority, would not take the keys of the Treasury vaults from a removed Treasurer. And so in every other case, that power is required to remove a man from office, which, in virtue of its proper authority, can immediately summon to its assistance the people or the civil or military officers of the executive department of the Government for its enforcement.

The duty of removing men from office is not enticing to anybody. It is well calculated to create jealousies and discontent that a self-seeking politician would dread to encounter. When the opportunity is presented to displace an enemy from office in order to reward a friend, or when a sordid motive is to be gratified by such an effort, the individual responsibility of the removal is the surest check upon the improper use of the power. The scrutiny of the Senate as to the merits of the person who is proposed to be substituted for the person removed will seldom fail to detect and expose any improper motive that may have influenced the selection. If the President's power of appointment is under restraint, that is all that can be necessary to secure an honest and pure administration in respect of the offices of the Government.

The idea was not inculcated in the early days of the Republic that the high powers of the Senate were granted to them in association with the President in making treaties and in canvassing the qualifications of persons for office for the purpose of holding a rod over him at the dictation of a party caucus. It was not then feared that either the President or the Senate would make merchandise of the offices in order to pay their retainers for personal or political services.

But, however much our fathers may have overestimated our virtues and the just influence of the moral sentiment of the people as a restraint upon the ambition or cupidity of their posterity, they did not fail to leave to us every power that is necessary to control the worst and most dangerous of the men who may ever become Presidents of the United States.

The responsibility of the President to public sentiment, if we must accept the modern doctrine that a President is not to be trusted to keep his oath of office, is something that the worst man could not dare to face when seeking to abuse the high trusts of his office, while the reward of the approbation of many millions of honest and patriotic Americans would be estimated by the best of men as being excellent and desirable beyond any other aspiration. These influences counted for much when the Constitution was being ordained, but they seem to count for nothing when they are weighed by a party caucus of Senators in view of their supposed better knowledge than our fathers had of the weakness of men when confronted with party demands.

But, discarding every other consideration besides the strict letter of the law, and conceding that our fathers had the best reasons for the most careful guards against the influence of corrupt ambition, it was not only wise but in the highest degree necessary that the President should have the complete power to immediately remove persons from office without the necessity of consultation with any other branch of the Government.

The power to annul the commission, and the power to demand the records and other property in the custody of the person removed, and the power to use all necessary force to fully execute the requirements of the public service, are all included in the power to remove an incumbent from office; and the summary use of these powers is sometimes an urgent necessity that admits of no delay. I need not enumerate instances to illustrate the force of this proposition. They will occur to every mind. The Treasury, or a subtreasury, or a mint, distant from Washington, might be robbed of its treasure while the President is consulting the Senate then in session in this Chamber as to the removal of the thief from office. Tribes of starving and desperate Indians might invade the white settlements, and plunder and massacre the people, while the President was consulting the Senate as to the removal of an Indian agent who had supplies in his possession appropriated to the Indians, but illegally refused to permit them to be issued. War with a foreign power might be precipitated by the unwise conduct of our minister while the President is endeavoring to get the consent of the Senate to recall him and send out another to take his place.

The expedient that has been adopted by statute of giving the President the power to suspend certain classes of officers at his discretion, so that the Senate might thereby participate in the executive power of removal, does not derogate from his constitutional power to remove an incumbent from office. If the power to remove an officer is included in the executive power vested in the President by the terms of the Constitution, that power can not be divested or abridged by any statute that authorizes the Senate to share it with the President. That would violate the distribution of powers, as arranged and established by the Constitution, and should be denominated the highest sin against the Constitution.

The Senate is no part of the executive branch of the Government, and no executive power is conferred upon it in the Constitution. Its power to consider and reject nominations or to consent to appointments to office is not an executive power any more than the President's veto is a legislative power. The Senate can not appoint a man to office in the Government of the United States any more than the President can enact a law.

It is impossible to believe that the men who framed our splendid body of organic laws were at such pains to confer on the Senate the definite power to render a judgment of removal against the incumbent of an office upon articles of impeachment voted by the House of Representatives, and that, after a trial so carefully guarded, and requiring a two-thirds vote of the Senate to convict the accused, and yet that they also gave the Senate the power, by a majority vote, to prohibit the President from removing the same man from the same office and for the same crime. It is an imputation on the good sense of the constitutional convention that they should have left this extraordinary power of the Senate hidden in such darkness that only the most experienced miners after remote, obscure, and concealed implications could discover it and bring it to the light.

It will be wise in the Senate to deny to itself executive powers that are not expressly conferred upon the body. Already it is the most powerful legislative body in the world and, so far, it has well proven the wisdom of the generation who gave to it extraordinary powers. Yet we have seen a more powerful organization than the Senate, a great political party, demand of the Senate the use of its supposed power to prevent removals from office by an obnoxious President, and the concession was made without a word. A law was enacted to affirm that supposed power, but it only lasted until there was a change of public sentiment, and the newly assumed powers of the Senate relapsed into a humiliating decadence; its votes were reversed, and its journals are in sackcloth and ashes, as they record the fate of the tenure-of-office act.

Even the Senate is not always firmly consistent. Its pride of power was not sufficient to hold on to its right, declared in a statute, to intermeddle with the executive power of a President who was all powerful with the people. The Senate seems to hold the right to control the power of removal or suspension as a political trust, subject to ebb and flow, so as to follow the superior power of the demands or necessities of party caucuses or conventions. It claimed this power in the most determined way when Johnson was President, and yielded it, on demand, to General Grant when he succeeded Johnson.

The Senate claims the right to all the real efficiency and value of the executive power in respect to the officers of the Government without the ability to make a movement or to take a step in the direction of its exercise until the House of Representatives puts them in motion to remove a man from office by impeachment, or the President puts them into action by asking their consent to the removal by him. An executive power is an absurd obstruction in government that can only act as it is acted upon; that can not move to execute the laws until another power has imparted to it the ability to move; that can only say, "guilty" or "not guilty" on articles of impeachment formulated by the House of Representatives without the capacity to amend them; that can only say "yes" or "no" when asked by the President to consent to the removal of a person from office; that can not make an appointment to office, nor fill up a vacancy, nor issue a commission, nor compel the President or anybody else to do these things.

This pretentious usurpation of the power of removal by the Senate, asserted in their behalf by the Committee on the Judiciary, is without the support of a single sentence in the Constitution that even hints at a grant of such power to this body. Its existence is assumed because the Constitution is silent as to its being conferred on some other department. Surely it is silent as to the bestowal of this power on the Senate; but it speaks in the broadest and most express terms of its being "vested in the President of the United States of America."

This alleged grant of power to the Senate, with all its burden of grave consequences to the country, is hung trembling on an attenuated thread of inference spun by the uncommon skill of the Committee on the Judiciary, from the false premise that the power of removal from office is not a distinct and substantive executive power, but one that arises by the law of necessity, as an incident of the power to appoint to office. The effect of their argument is that the power to appoint to office is not an executive power, with which the President is invested by the first section of the second article of the Constitution and which is modified in the second section of the same article, but that it is granted only by the second section, and is not included in the first section, which grants the executive power to the President, and that the power to remove persons from office has no place in the Constitution, except as an outgrowth of the power to appoint to office. The premise is false, and the conclusion is without support.

The appointment and the issue of the commission are purely executive acts of the President, in which the Senate can not participate. If, therefore, the power to remove from office is only the incident of the power to appoint, the incidental power belongs to the appointing power, which is the executive power vested in the President.

The Senate, through its Committee on the Judiciary, assumes that, because power is given to it to defeat a nomination of the President by refusing its consent to the proposed appointment on one day, which it may give on the next day if it chooses, that it must have been intended to give to the Senate a different power, another power as distinct from the power to consent to an appointment as the power to destroy is from the power to create.

This assumption can not be justified either in law or as a wise and safe policy. It has the disagreeble aspect, also, of an effort unduly to magnify the powers of the Senate, to the disturbance of the harmony and the wasting in needless friction of the power of the Government to do the will of the people constitutionally expressed.

When President Grant demanded the restoration of his constitutional rights in removing men from office they were restored. The Senate retreated in good order, but still sullen from its defeat. The law was virtually repealed. The President was invited, in the repealing act, either to destroy Johnson's appointees by suspending them or by cutting them down. Their official lives he could terminate either by starvation or decapitation, by hanging them up or by shooting them down. He was not to be embarrassed by an order from the Senate that a person he had suspended should be returned to duty and forced back into the office against his consent. The Senate only claimed the privilege of being present at the execution when invited to it by the President. I believe that honor is still solicited by the Senate, and we are about to show a very bad temper because the President refuses us the privilege of conducting the funeral, as well as the honor of disposing of the official life of the victim.

Thus was ended, as the world supposed, the third and last campaign of Congress against the rightful powers of the executive department; but the forlorn hope comes forward to close the war by a resolution of indignant denunciation against the Attorney-General, but meant for the President, because he has shown enough respect for the remains of the tenure-of-office act and for the feelings of its bereaved friends not to rudely kick it out of his path of duty as he marches along. Neither the Congress nor the Senate can hope successfully to renew this war upon the President, when the ground already lost in the retreat before General Grant includes the whole field, not enough of it being left on which to form a line or plant a gun.

The Presidential office is limited to four years. He can appoint men to office, even where the tenure is fixed by law, whose terms will not expire until a very late period in the term of his successor. In the case of foreign ministers, to whose offices no terms are affixed, the appointment and commission continue indefinitely until they are removed. Is it more dangerous to the country that the appointees of a President shall be held in office by the Senate after the people have turned him out than that his successor should have the power to remove them? The power of removal is the only one relating to officers who are obnoxious to the people that the President can exert in their behalf and to carry out their will as expressed in his election. It may happen, if it has not in fact happened, that a President is elected on a pledge to the people to free the offices from obnoxious incumbents. If they have any use for the ballot, or any real influence in their own Government, the administration should respond to their will so expressed.

If the Senate can prevent the removal of such obnoxious persons, the people, who do not elect Senators, would find their way to this relief blocked, because the Senate can tie the hands of their chosen representative in the Presidency.

The power of removal is the attribute of the Presidential office that is held more directly in trust for the people than any other, and is more important to them than the power of appointment, or than almost any other power that the President possesses. A bad man in office is a certain evil, a known quantity of danger to the people. His frauds and peculations have excited their indignation; his immoralities have shocked and disgusted them; his grand larcenies have robbed them; his corrupting example has alarmed them; the glamour of his fame as a warrior has dazed them; his wealth has gathered supporters about him that applaud his villainies, and many of these may have had seats in the Senate, bought for them as seats in a stock exchange are purchased, and the people are aroused at the dangerous power he wields; he may be a Secretary of the Treasury, with all that vast power in his hands; he may be the real master of the President, and the people vote that they will destroy his power. All they can do is to elect a President who will remove him. If they do that, and the Senate can interpose its veto upon their will, the idea that elections by the people are of any value might as well be dismissed. We must elect a President, and then wait until we can change the majority in the Senate to coincide with the will of the people before we can lay the hand of authority on the throat of a corrupt tyrant who holds a great and controlling office to turn him out.

The chances that we shall incur dangers that will surely destroy us, if we can not destroy them, are a thousand fold increased when the Senate, for whom the people can not vote, can compel the President to obey their will above the will of the people both as to removals from office and as to appointments to office.

Except through the President and the members of the House the will of the people is not a direct and potent factor in our Government. The voters of the United States are by no means so powerful in controlling their Government as are the voters of the Kingdon of Great Britain. Our fathers so arranged it, and we are content. But if they had seen fit to declare in the Constitution that the Senate should have the power over the offices, without which none can be appointed and none removed, we would be to-day deploring the fact that they had given us a deceptive liberty in place of a more beneficent British liberty—the name and semblance of a government of the people, but in fact of the Senate.

So I estimate the right of the people to control removals from office as being of far more value to them than the power to control appointments. The latter is the hope that wisdom may prevent recurrence of evil in the future, while the power of removal is the only means by which an existing evil may be eradicated, and is the demand of a people who are already wronged. To illustrate this, I am proud to say that I can not cite the Senate to an actual example in the history of our foreign relations. But "it is the impossible that too often happens," and, in our peculiar system the Senate has a dangerous opportunity, if it chooses, to set the people at defiance, if it may refuse to permit the President to dismiss a foreign minister. It could be imagined that majorities in the Senate might exist that would so abhor a President that they would keep a minister at a foreign court who was in every sense unfriendly to him and to his administration—a minister who would provoke war while the President and the people desired peace, one that would break a treaty that two-thirds of the Senate had ratified, and who would be sustained in it by a bare majority, found at a later date, in the Senate, who would keep him in place in spite of the President. Without the power of removal resting in the will of the President, and to be used as he might find occasion to use it in many dangerous emergencies, we would be in a condition far worse than we would if the Senate had the exclusive power of appointment to office. It is the power to remove that must be relied on to save the country from a known and actual danger at the hands of a bad officer, while the power to appoint is most useful as a security against future abuses. The future is best secured by careful counsels, while the present safety often demands prompt, decisive, and conclusive action.

I close with an inquiry that deserves if it does not demand an answer from the Committee on the Judiciary. Is the committee prepared to assert that the President never had the power of removing persons from office; that only Congress can confer this power by law; that the alleged power of the Senate to refuse to consent to the removal of a person from office is conferred upon this body by the Constitution; that the Senate holds its power by a grant made in the Constitution, while the President must produce an act of Congress to sustain his action whenever he removes a person from office; that the Senate has the essential power to make appointments to office, because it can prevent such as are not to its liking, and the power to make removals, because it can prevent such as it may not choose to consent to?

Have all these removals that were made by Presidents without the consent of the Senate for nearly one hundred years been sheer usurpations of power? If so, where has been the Senate, now so vigilant, while the President, with or without the sanction of law, has openly seized upon powers granted to it and denied to him, and has ravaged its constitutional domain? We are asked to believe that the framers of our Constitution when forming and adjusting the great executive department of the United States forgot to notice the power of removing men from office. They neglected to mention it by name or to give it a place in the grand system. It was the great lost or abandoned power of government, wandering upon a dark sea of uncertainty, either flotsam, jetsam, or ligan, waiting to be taken by the salvage corps of the Senate and condemned to its own use. In the mean time the President had used this power, no one disputing his right, until shipwreck overtook the fortunes of Andrew Johnson.

The salvage corps of the Senate was promptly on hand. They had helped to wreck the ship and claimed this last power of removal from office as their part of the spoil. They got it and held it for nearly two years, and then surrendered to General Grant, as the States of the South did the asserted right of secession. "In the Providence of God, who ruleth in the councils of men and guideth the nations in their courses, all things that are right will, in the end, be made right."

I have put some questions to the members of the majority of the Committee on the Judiciary which I hope they will have the courage to attempt to answer. They have not done so, either in their report or in their arguments. Those questions will be found in the RECORD, and I again invite especial attention to them.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. Mr. President——

Mr. MCPHERSON. I suppose it would be as agreeable to the Senator from Oregon to go on to-morrow morning with his speech, and as we need an executive session I will move, with his permission, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BERRY in the chair). Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let me say a word.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I will yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator from New Jersey allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. MCPHERSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish now, in pursuance of what was said yesterday, to ask unanimous consent that the general debate on the resolutions shall terminate at 5 o'clock to-morrow, and that whatever Senator may be in charge of the resolutions at that time shall have one hour for a general reply, at the end of which, or before if it does not take an hour, a final vote shall be taken on the resolutions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont asks unanimous consent that the general debate be terminated to-morrow at 5 o'clock, and that the Senator in charge of the resolutions shall then have one hour in which to close the argument, and that the vote shall then be taken. Is there objection?

Mr. KENNA. That would give from 2 until 5 o'clock to Senators who may desire to speak upon either side on the resolutions. I have nothing to say myself, but I doubt very much if that would give an opportunity to those who desire to speak to submit their observations before the time fixed by the Senator from Vermont. Having had the opportunity and all the opportunity I desire myself, I am unwilling that any other Senator on either side should not have the fullest opportunity to say what he may desire to submit on the subject.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I will make this suggestion, because I wish to accommodate every Senator and to get on, that the general debate shall terminate on Friday at 3 o'clock, and that the resolutions may be taken up earlier than 2 o'clock if the Senate so choose.

Mr. COCKRELL. Immediately after the morning business.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, so as to conclude them; and that at 3 o'clock on Friday the general debate shall terminate, and that the Senator in charge shall have an hour to reply.

Mr. VOORHEES. Does the Senator from Vermont mean to take the resolutions up to-morrow earlier than 2 o'clock?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is what I suggest, in order to give more time.

Mr. VOORHEES. I only desire to say, with entire frankness, that I wish to submit a few remarks to-morrow, following the Senator from Oregon, but not at any great length, and I will agree to any proposition to terminate the debate fairly. I think I know of some other Senators, not all perhaps on this side of the Chamber, who desire to occupy some time.

I wish to say, however, that the termination of this debate will depend somewhat necessarily upon the character of the discussion as it proceeds to a close; but so far as I am concerned, I am not averse to concurring in the suggestion made by the Senator from Vermont, if that is the wish of the rest of the Senate.

Mr. CALL. I do not desire to delay the termination of the debate. It is my expectation, however, to occupy a very few minutes of time before the debate closes. I do not know what other Senators there may be who may have it in view to take a part in the discussion; but I should not wish such an arrangement made as to forestall either myself or others from occupying some very small portion of time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think that every Senator who wishes to speak might have a full opportunity by the time suggested, and certainly if he should not I should be willing to do something else. I suggest that we arrange to take this matter up earlier than 2 o'clock to-morrow and earlier than 2 o'clock the next day, and then have the general debate terminate at 4 o'clock, if you please, instead of 3, on Friday, and that whatever Senator may then be in charge of the resolutions (and I say that because it may happen, with my cold and the trouble I have with my throat, that I may be ill, though I hope not) should have an hour for a general reply; and then we shall close at the end of that.

Mr. CALL. I suggest to the Senator from Vermont to say Friday generally, without mentioning 4 o'clock or any particular hour.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If we do not mention a particular hour we have found by former experience that we never come to anything.

Mr. CALL. Simply say "before the adjournment of the Senate on Friday."

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have stated my proposition, Mr. President, and if there is objection, of course that is the end of it for now.

Mr. KENNA. I have no objection to urge to the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont. On the contrary, I believe it is quite generally desired that the debate shall be concluded at an early day and the matter before the Senate disposed of. However, I can not quite bring myself to agree that an understanding shall be had by the Senate that the Senator in charge of the resolutions, whoever he may be—and I assume of course that that Senator will be the Senator from Vermont—shall have an hour to conclude the debate, and that thereupon the vote shall be taken.

Mr. FRYE. That is the rule of debate.

Mr. KENNA. I do not know what may happen within that hour. I have no reason to believe that I should desire to say anything afterward; but after a debate of some two or three weeks in the Senate, in view of a general agreement now, it might be quite important that something should be said, not in conclusion but at least in notice of what might be said within that last hour; and I do not want to be precluded, speaking only for myself, from the opportunity, if I should feel that opportunity to be important to me or to my view of this question, to say a word or two, if such word should be rendered necessary or of any sort of consequence by that concluding hour's argument.

I assume that such an opportunity would be given, notwithstanding any sort of arrangement we may have now; but lest there might be some misunderstanding on that score, I desire now to say, as I understand to be the privilege of a Senator on this floor under the rules, that I should claim that opportunity if I thought it necessary; and I do not now desire to acquiesce in any understanding that may preclude it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The suggestion I made has only been the one that has followed the uniform practice of the Senate to my knowledge for it will be twenty years the 5th of April. Where any discussions that involve important considerations, whether political or legislative or whatever, were brought to a close, it has been universally agreed that the Senator in charge of the measure should have the opportunity of a general reply, and that then the vote should be taken.

Of course I have no criticism to make upon my friend from West Virginia insisting upon his rights, as he has them, as a Senator, to speak as often and as long as he pleases, first or last or any other time, when under the rules he can get the floor, as of course here everybody can at any time in due order.

Mr. KENNA. I think the Senator from Vermont misunderstands me. I am very far from insisting that any other than the Senator in charge of the resolutions shall have the concluding speech. So far as I am concerned he may make that speech as long as he chooses. On the other hand, I am quite unwilling to agree that any Senator, in support of the resolutions or otherwise, shall arbitrarily (I use the term not in any possible offensive sense) have an opportunity to conclude the discussion and thereby exclude everybody else. I should certainly not desire for a moment to exclude the Senator in charge of the resolutions from the fullest opportunity to make the concluding argument, and at any length it may suit his convenience or his judgment; but to say now that any particular Senator shall have an hour fixed by the clock to conclude a debate which has extended over a week or ten days or two weeks, and thereby to agree that no other Senator shall have the opportunity, even for a moment, to reply to any utterance of that hour, I am quite unwilling to accede to. I think there is no misunderstanding about the matter. I am perfectly willing that any time shall be fixed that recognizes a reasonable opportunity on both sides of the Chamber to meet such issues as may be developed toward the close of the debate.

Mr. CALL. I wish to make a suggestion to the Senator from Vermont. I see no difficulty in the debate being closed on Friday without specifying any particular hour, even if we should have to remain here an hour or two longer than usual. But it is not probable from all I can hear that there will be any necessity for that. It seems to me an understanding that the debate shall close on Friday would answer the purposes of the Senator.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As the Senator from West Virginia objects, and as I do not wish to compel my friend from Oregon to go on now, as gentlemen on the other side have not been compelled to do so at this late hour of the day, if there is no objection by anybody else I will accede, as it is all I can do, to the suggestion of the Senator from Florida, and ask that we come to an understanding that this matter shall be brought to a final disposition on Friday.

Mr. HOAR. It is only 4 o'clock now.

Mr. FRYE. There is time enough for a two hours' speech to-day.

Mr. BUTLER. May I suggest to the Senator from Vermont a way out of the difficulty? At the expiration of the argument of one hour of the Senator having charge of the resolutions why not extend the debate for one hour longer, limiting each Senator to five minutes?

Mr. EDMUNDS. As I understand my friend from Oregon is perfectly willing to go on now, we can wait and see. Perhaps we shall "sit it out" to-night.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I can go on either now or in the morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon has the floor.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. Mr. President, it is not my intention to discuss all the constitutional or political questions involved in this debate, or in fact do more than state very briefly my views in reference to the report and the different resolutions contained in the series reported from the Judiciary Committee and the considerations which shall govern me in any vote I may cast.

In the main I concur in the report submitted by the honorable chairman of that committee, at least in so far as it asserts the doctrine that it is the duty of the executive officers to furnish, when called upon by the Senate, documents and papers relating to the administration of the office by a suspended official; and while I agree, as stated in the report, that it is desirable upon the part of the Senate and highly proper that the Senate should be in possession of such official papers in considering the propriety of advising and consenting to the proposed removal of an official, I should not be disposed to insist that the presence of such papers is absolutely necessary, positively essential, as stated in substance and effect in the report, to the discharge upon the part of the Senate of its constitutional duty in advising and consenting to proposed removals from office, and this upon the assumption that the right of the Senate to pass upon the act of removal by the President is unquestioned—and that is a question I do not propose to discuss at this time. And with this qualification I should be disposed to agree to all that is said in the report, and therefore with such qualification should concur in the first resolution, which reads as follows:

Resolved, That the foregoing report of the Committee on the Judiciary be agreed to and adopted.

And believing, furthermore, that the Attorney-General is plainly in error in his refusal to furnish the papers called for in the case under consideration, I assent cheerfully and without hesitation or qualification to the second resolution in the series reported, and which reads as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate hereby expresses its condemnation of the refusal of the Attorney-General, under whatever influence, to send to the Senate copies of papers called for by its resolution of the 25th of January, and set forth in the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, as in violation of his official duty and subversive of the fundamental principles of the Government and of a good administration thereof.

And to this also should I give my assent, regardless of the question as to whether the Senate has or has not the right under the Constitution and the laws to pass upon the act of removal. If called upon, however, to vote on the series as a whole, I desire to state that in that vote, should it ever be given, I, in so far as it relates to the indorsement of the third of the series, shall give it most reluctantly and under positive protest, and for the reasons I now propose briefly to submit, and shall only hesitate, if hesitate I shall, from casting a vote against the series on account of the, to me, objectionable character of the third resolution, because of my earnest indorsement of the second resolution, from my great reluctance to do anything that might seem like antagonizing the views and wishes of party leaders on what may be considered a party question, and out of deference to my party friends and the superior judgment of those friends who constitute the majority of the Judiciary Committee, but with whose superior judgment, in so far as the third resolution is concerned, I frankly confess I am unable to agree; and my vote, if given, in so far as it relates to such resolution, must be considered merely perfunctory and for the reasons suggested, and given under decided protest; and therefore I must not, when we shall come to consider nominations of the President, whether these resolutions be adopted or not, be considered as in any manner bound by it except as in the construction I shall be pleased to give it; but in all such cases, and in every case of a nomination by the President, I shall reserve the right to exercise my individual judgment and cast my vote either for or against advising and consenting to nominations and the proposed removal of officials in accordance with my individual views of my constitutional duty in the premises as I am now about to state them, and in accordance with the facts and the right of each particular case as they may appear to me before the Senate.

This third resolution, to which I find objection and against which, if I had the privilege of a separate vote, I should certainly cast my vote, reads as follows:

Resolved, That it is, under these circumstances, the duty of the Senate to refuse its advice and consent to proposed removals of officers, the documents and papers in reference to the supposed official or personal misconduct of whom are withheld by the Executive or any head of a Department when deemed necessary by the Senate and called for in considering the matter.

To the end that the precise question I raise may be accurately defined and definitely stated I will here submit what I would regard as a fitting and proper substitute for this third resolution, whether considered from a constitutional or party standpoint, did I feel at liberty, in view of all the circumstances, at this time to offer a substitute, which at the precise moment I confess I do not. I ask that my proposed substitute be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

That in the event of the failure or refusal of the head of a Department, whether under the direction of the Executive or otherwise, to furnish the papers, or copies thereof, relating to a suspension or proposed removal by the President in any given case, when called for by the Senate, it still remains the constitutional duty of the Senate to proceed within a reasonable time, and as soon as convenient, to consider the nomination sent to the Senate in such case by the President, in the light of such information and evidence as it has before it, or may be able to obtain, and to either advise and consent, or refuse to advise and consent to the appointment of the person nominated according to its best judgment, based upon the information and evidence before it; and in no event is the refusal on the part of the Executive or the head of a Department to furnish papers or copies thereof relating to a suspension or proposed removal, when called for by the Senate, to be deemed in and of itself a sufficient reason either for a failure upon the part of the Senate to consider any nomination, or for a decision refusing its advice and consent to the appointment of the person nominated.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. It may be observed, as I have stated, that the third resolution of the committee attempts to define the constitutional duty of the Senate in a particular case and under certain clearly defined and specified circumstances in the matter of the exercise of its power in advising and consenting to appointments to public office, or, as stated in the resolution, in advising and consenting to proposed removals. I should define the constitutional duty of the Senate under this same case as stated, and under these precise circumstances, not in the manner stated in this third resolution, but as described in the paper which I send to the desk and which I may or may not feel authorized to offer as a substitute at a later day in this debate—depending on the course the debate may take and other circumstances. For the present, I submit it not as a substitute, not as an amendment, but as part of my remarks:

It will be observed, as I have stated, that this third resolution of the committee is an attempt to define the limits and scope of the constitutional duty of the Senate in a given case in the matter of the exercise of its constitutional power to advise and consent to appointments to public office. And while assuming, and I agree very properly, that the withholding by the Executive or any head of a Department of the documents and papers in reference to the supposed official or personal misconduct of a suspended official, when deemed necessary by the Senate and called for in considering the matter, is, as stated in the second resolution, a violation of official duty, subversive of the fundamental principles of the Government, and of a good administration thereof, asserts as a legal and constitutional corollary that in such cases and under such circumstances it is the duty of the Senate to refuse its advice and consent, as the resolution has it, to "proposed removals of officials." That is, to say in all such cases the mere fact that the Executive or head of a Department has failed to perform a duty by refusing to furnish certain papers deemed necessary by the Senate before it can have any knowledge of their import, and which may or may not in a measure illuminate the subject under consideration, shall be a complete justification in every such case for an absolute suspension upon the part of the Senate of all further inquiry for information in every other direction, of all attempts at investigation through other mediums of knowledge, for a peremptory refusal to further consider any and all other information or evidence that may actually be before the Senate or within the easy reach of its process and power, and for an absolute suspension of the exercise of all official deliberation and judgment upon the part of the Senate, and a full, complete and conclusive constitutional justification of the Senate in refusing for that reason, and that alone, to lend its advice and consent to a nomination or proposed appointment.

This is in the clearly expressed language of the resolution, and in terms free from all ambiguity or obscuration, the precise position assumed by the majority of the Judiciary Committee in its third resolution, and from this I dissent, most emphatically and absolutely, and without the slightest hesitation.

I take it the constitutional duty of the Senate of the United States in reference to its power to advise and consent to appointments to public office can neither be enlarged nor diminished, extended nor circumscribed, nor can its imperative and binding obligations be either strengthened or weakened by the omission, or failure, or refusal, if you please, upon the part of the Executive or the head of any Department to furnish any document or paper whatever, official or otherwise, relating either to the fitness of the person nominated, or the administration of the office by the person suspended, and whom it is proposed to remove, and this irrespective of the question whether it is or is not the duty of the Executive and heads of Departments to furnish such documents and papers when called for.

The Constitution declares:

> He [the President] shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint embassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, &c.

It will not, I presume, be denied that this clause making it the duty of the President to nominate, and, when the advice and consent of the Senate is given, to appoint certain public officers provided for by the Constitution and the laws, also imposes a constitutional duty on the Senate no less imperative, no less important, and no less binding than that imposed on the Executive, and from a speedy, just, and fearless discharge of which upon the part of the Senate, with such aids as it may reasonably, properly, and constitutionally bring to its support, it can not be released or in any manner absolved by any failure, or dereliction, or refusal on the part of the Executive or heads of Departments to furnish papers. The constitutional duty of the Senate can not be abridged, nor its obligations be in any manner or respect weakened or rendered obsolete by any lack of performance of duty on the part either of the Executive or any other officer of the Government.

Assuming, therefore, that the President is occupying untenable ground in withholding from the Senate certain official papers which may or may not throw light upon the questions that may properly be considered by the Senate in the exercise of its constitutional duty in advising and consenting to appointments to public office, it does not, in my judgment, follow by any manner of means that the Senate shall do that which in my judgment amounts to a violation of its duty in the premises by proceeding to decide a case adversely, not upon such testimony and information as it may have before it, and such other testimony as it, with proper diligence and effort, and the placing in proper and efficient motion of the instrumentalities and processes and powers that attach to it, might be able to procure, but upon the sole ground and for the sole reason that the Executive or head of a Department has failed to furnish certain testimony which, in the judgment of the Senate, should have been furnished, and which, if furnished, as a matter of fact might or might not in any manner influence or change the judgment of the Senate in the matter under consideration.

This third resolution of the Judiciary Committee declares in purpose and effect that in the event of failure or refusal to produce the papers in any given case when called for that then on that, and on that alone, it becomes the duty of the Senate to reject the nomination; in other words, if the President shall omit or fail or refuse to discharge a particular duty as understood by the Senate, that fact, and that alone, in the case stated shall furnish a sufficient reason for a decision on the part of the Senate to the effect that it will not advise and consent to a particular appointment; and this, too, when the Senate might with proper effort become fully convinced of the fact that the suspension of the incumbent and the nomination of a successor were just and proper acts upon the part of the Executive and in the interest of good government, or on the other hand that a gross injustice has been done in making the suspension, a flagrant wrong inflicted on the incumbent, and that therefore a judgment of refusal to advise and consent should properly be rendered on the information and evidence before it; and notwithstanding the further fact that the papers asked for and refused, as I have before stated, might not throw the slightest ray of light on the questions involved.

To determine in advance here and now as the proposition is in this third resolution of the Judiciary Committee, that this Senate will reject a nomination or nominations, in fact all future nominations, whenever the papers are called for and refused, is to declare in advance that we will reject a nomination, not because of evidence before the Senate to justify such rejection, but rather because of a failure on the part of the Senate, through an obstruction caused by the mistake or misconduct, if you please, of some other department or officer of the Government, to procure certain papers which, as has been said, it deems necessary, and without any knowledge of their import, and which may or may not throw light upon the question as to the propriety of the suspension or the worthiness of the nominee. It is, in other words, to determine in advance of the consideration of appointments by this body; in advance of the receipt of any evidence on the subject; in advance of any knowledge as to the conclusive character of the evidence that may come before the Senate, but also absolutely in advance of suspensions and nominations by the Executive that we will decide adversely to each and every nomination now pending, or which may hereafter be sent to the Senate in the event that the papers in such case are withheld when called for by the Senate. That is to say, in all such cases testimony shall not be considered in reaching a conclusion; the exercise of judgment shall have no place in our deliberations; in a word, we shall not deliberate at all. There shall be no weighing of evidence, no interchange of opinions among Senators, no effort to secure information or testimony bearing upon the question; whatever of personal knowledge any Senator may have as to the entire propriety of the suspension, or the absolute worthiness and fitness in all respects of the nominee, or of the absolute unfitness of the incumbent to continue in office and the entire worthiness of the nomination, shall not be considered, but shall go for naught, provided always that a bare majority of this Senate shall without knowing anything about their nature deem it necessary, and shall call for the papers bearing upon the particular case and they are withheld; but on the contrary we must decide the case in such event without deliberation, without any consideration of the testimony before us, be it much or little, vague or conclusive, without the least exercise of judgment and according to the arbitrary, and, as I believe, unwarranted and unconstitutional test you now propose to establish; that is to say, if the papers are not furnished when deemed necessary and called for, and be they many or few, important or otherwise, and this when we do not know, and can not possibly know what they are, or whether in fact there are any of any character whatever, we must vote to reject. Or to state the case somewhat differently, because the President fails to furnish certain papers which may or may not shed some information on the subject under consideration and which we think it his duty to furnish, we will introduce into this body a political and legislative lex talionis, and thus violate, as I believe, our plain constitutional duty, by making this fact alone—this omission of duty on the part of others the sufficient and sole basis for a decision on our part—refusing to advise and consent to any such nominations.

To my mind any such arbitrary, iron-clad rule as this is not warranted by any constitutional or statutory provision, and is in my judgment not only a very plain violation of our constitutional duty, but will, I fear, be considered by many as smacking withal of a spirit of obstructive partisanship and factional opposition scarcely less reprehensible than that exhibited by the administration in its action in withholding papers, the effect of which is, whether the result of mistake or otherwise, to conceal wrongfully and illegally from the public gaze and the official scrutiny of the Senate all official papers relating to suspensions and appointments, which, by the very act of the Executive, have been made part and parcel of the public archives, and which by right should be forever open to public inspection.

For one, believing as I do that the Executive is in error in declining to furnish papers whether considered in reference to his constitutional prerogatives, and duties, or otherwise—and what I mean by otherwise is that I believe this position of the President and his Cabinet to be the very worst blunder of the administration to the present date, and one whether the result of honest mistake or otherwise that will not in any perceptible degree contribute to its fame as a reform administration or tend to strengthen the people in its sincerity in or fidelity to the doctrines of civil-service reform, and for honest, open, fair-dealing with suspended office-holders—I am unwilling to make that error, as error I believe it to be, upon the part of an Executive who is striving to give the country a good administration the excuse for a still more serious one on the part of the Senate. And, in my judgment, if the majority of this Senate assumes the position and adheres to it that the mere fact of the refusal to produce papers, which the Senate deems necessary, when called for, is in and of itself a sufficient and conclusive ground for the rejection of nominations it will be very difficult to convince the great masses of the people of this country of any political party that it is not a very impotent excuse for what will be by them generally considered an effort upon the part of a Republican Senate to keep Republicans in office and Democrats out. In other words, it will be said all over this Republic, and not without some show of reason, that it is an effort to perpetuate Republican rule in so far as holding office is concerned under a Democratic administration, and when the people of this country have decided at the ballot-box in favor of a change.

But, says the honorable chairman of the Judiciary Committee, it is only in a case where the papers are deemed necessary by the Senate and are called for that their refusal makes it the duty of the Senate to refuse its advice and consent to a proposed removal. My answer is that this suggestion, when considered in connection with the position assumed in the report of the committee, that it is the duty of the Executive to furnish papers in all cases when called for, and that it is not only desirable but necessary that the Senate should have the papers in each case of a suspension, but that since the passage of the tenure-of-office act over nineteen years ago it has been the uniform practice of the Committee on the Judiciary to call for papers in all cases of suspensions, amounts simply to this, if these views of the committee be adopted by the Senate without qualification, that is to say:

First. It is our duty to have the papers in every case of a suspension and proposed removal;

Second. It is our duty to call for them in every such case if, as stated in the report, it is not only desirable but necessary to the proper performance of our duties that we should have them; and,

Third. It being our duty to call for them in every such case, and being called for and refused, then our constitutional duty as stated in the third resolution is to reject each and every nomination. In other words, following out the theory of the report and the first resolution, it would seem to be impossible that any case could arise wherein it would not be the duty of the Senate to call for the papers.

And as the Executive has peremptorily declined to furnish the papers in any such case, then the logical and inevitable conclusion is, according to the theory of this third resolution, that the Senate should not in any case advise and consent to the proposed removal of a single suspended officer. The undoubted construction of this third resolution when construed as it unquestionably must be in the light of the preceding resolutions and the report is simply this: That while it is not only desirable but absolutely necessary that the Senate should have the papers in all cases of suspensions and proposed removals, therefore, whenever the Senate shall deem the papers necessary, and this must be so in every case, following out the logic of the report and first resolution, and shall call for them and they shall be refused, then it becomes ipso facto the duty of the Senate for that reason and that alone to refuse its advice and consent to a proposed removal and to the appointment of the person designated by the President.

In view of what precedes, therefore, the insertion in the third resolution of the words "when deemed necessary by the Senate," is simply reasoning in a circle, because, as stated in the report, which is adopted by the first resolution, it is declared in positive terms, and without any qualification whatever, that in order to enable the Senate to properly perform its duties and to protect the interest of the public, considered in its every aspect, it is not only desirable but necessary that the simple facts in regard to what the conduct of suspended officials has been should be made known to the Senate, and then assuming that these facts can only be made to appear by the documents and papers on file, the report declares:

> Such information, it would seem, the Executive is determined the Senate shall not possess.

And then follows this third resolution declaring that in all cases where the papers are deemed necessary by the Senate, and that is, if this report be adopted without qualification, and followed in every case of a suspended officer, and are called for, and surely if they are not only desirable but necessary to the performance of our public duty and the protection of public interest, then it is the bounden duty of the Senate to call for them in every case of a suspension, and they are refused, that then in every case it shall be the duty of the Senate for that reason to refuse to advise and consent to the removal of a suspended official. But even though the report of the committee had not asserted the doctrine, which by the way, as has been seen, it does assert in unqualified terms—

That as a matter of fact the possession of these documents and papers by the Senate is not only desirable but absolutely essential to the discharge of its constitutional and legal duty, and that, therefore, in the absence of such declarations on the part of the committee, it still remained an open question for the Senate to decide in each particular case as it comes up as to whether or not it was necessary in that particular case to have the papers, upon what principle of justice, or equity, or fair play, I would inquire, could the Senate declare that in one case of a suspended official in the State of Oregon, or any other State, it was necessary and proper that the official papers filed demanding his removal, or which in any manner affect the administration of the office from which he is suspended, should be brought before the Senate and be given an opportunity to meet and answer any charges they might contain, while in another case no call for such papers should be made, when perhaps in the latter case the papers (and the character of all papers on file in all cases must be presumed in these days of executive protest to be unknown to the Senate) may either contain false charges against the suspended incumbent, or, on the other hand, may contain explanatory evidence of charges of incompeteney or unworthiness of the officer which may through other sources than the public records have been brought to the attention of the Senate.

On the theory, therefore, of the report that the official papers are not merely desirable, but absolutely essential to enable the Senate to properly discharge its constitutional and legal duty of advising and consenting to appointments, or, if you please, to the removal of an official, I am unable to comprehend how the question of the necessity for the papers can be left an open one in any conceivable case should these resolutions be adopted without qualification.

The rule intended to be established must be and is intended to be a general rule applicable alike to all cases of suspensions from office by the President, not a rule intended for extreme, peculiar, unusual, and extraordinary cases; and the rule here proposed, stripped of every disguise, construing this third resolution in connection with what precedes it, is simply this:

First. We are entitled to the official papers in every case of suspension;

Second. Their production in every such case is not only desirable but essential to the proper discharge of duty on the part of the Senate, and the protection of the public interest in its every aspect;

Third. When called for, as it is our duty in every case to call for them, if we follow the report of the committee, it is the duty of the President to furnish them; and Fourth. In the event that he fail in this regard to do his duty, it then becomes the constitutional duty of the Senate to refuse to advise and consent to the removal of the suspended official for that reason, and that alone.

That is to say, because of the fact that the papers have not been furnished and the further fact, as asserted in substance and effect in the report, that without the production of such papers it is impossible that the Senate can properly discharge it constitutional functions. To this latter conclusion I do not agree. I agree the Senate should call for the papers on file in every case of suspension; I agree moreover that it is desirable that the Senate should have such official papers in every case, that it is the duty of the administration to produce them when called for; and I agree furthermore that a failure to perform this duty on the part of the Executive may and undoubtedly will in many instances and in many respects embarrass the Senate in the performance of its constitutional duty may in a measure obstruct the channels of justice, may in some instances inflict great wrong, not only on the suspended official but on the Government, and do violence to all correct rules of civil-service reform, and interfere in a measure with the proper and orderly administration of the public business, yet with all this I am not prepared to believe that any such omission of duty on the part of the Executive shall of itself be a justification on the part of the Senate of the United States for an omission on its part to perform its constitutional functions of either advising and consenting or refusing to advise and consent to the appointment of each person whose nomination may be submitted to the Senate by the Executive, according to its best judgment, with such lights as it may be able to bring to bear upon each particular case.

With the same propriety it seems to me we might resolve in advance that in the event the Senate deems it necessary in the consideration of any case of a suspended official and of a proposed removal that the suspended official should testify before the Senate, and in case of his refusal to attend on being summoned, or in case of failure to secure his testimony, believing it to be important, that it would in such a case be the constitutional duty of the Senate to refuse to advise and consent to the proposed removal and appointment.

In all investigations, legislative, executive, judicial, and canonical, it is no uncommon thing, but, on the contrary, a frequent occurrence, that testimony deemed important can not be obtained even after all the powers of the investigating tribunal have been brought into exercise and every effort exhausted, but what would be thought of a court or any other tribunal that would make this fact alone, this failure to procure a certain paper deemed important or even necessary, the excuse for a failure to investigate at all, or the basis alone of a judgment either for or against a party to the controversy?

If it were true that the United States Senate had but one official eye and one official ear through which to obtain knowledge in reference to the fitness of men in office, and of those whom it is proposed to put in, and that such knowledge could come alone through the executive officers of the Government and from papers on file in the Department in any given case of suspension, then there might be a justification in every case for refusing to advise and consent to an appointment when such papers, the sole means of information, were withheld; but such is not the fact. The official eyes and ears of this body are numerous.

The powers of the Senate in reference to obtaining information upon any subject within its jurisdiction are by no means insignificant, dwarfed, or limited; its process reaches to the extremities of the Republic, though it may be powerless to grasp official files of the Executive Departments, against the protest of the Executive and the assertion of executive power. By the Senate's order any of its committees may be empowered to send for persons and papers, and in every instance compel their production and presence, unless perhaps in the single case of official files in executive offices when executive protest is interposed, and I doubt but little that the honorable chairman of the Judiciary Committee would not concede that an exception exists even in that case; it can inaugurate investigations, and has done so time and time again, for the purpose of aiding in obtaining evidence, disclosing facts, and reaching conclusions.

In case of a suspension it can permit or compel the suspended officer to be heard under oath or otherwise; it can summon his neighbors and friends if he desire it, or whether he does or not; it can take the testimony of those familiar with his personal and official conduct; it can listen to the statements of Senators under oath or otherwise from the State where the suspended official resides and by whom he is personally known as to their knowledge of his personal and official conduct, his standing in the community, his reputation for honesty and sobriety, and his general worthiness or unworthiness for the position he holds and from the exercise of the duties of which he has been suspended. The fact moreover that there is a refusal upon the part of the Executive to furnish the papers and documents when respectfully called for may perhaps be properly considered in connection with all the circumstances of a particular case in reaching a correct conclusion based on the information and evidence before it.

While, therefore, delays and embarrassments and obstructions may be the result of the failure on the part of the President to furnish papers, and in some instances even great injustice to individuals may ensue, it must not be presumed for one moment, it seems to me, that the Senate of the United States is not sufficiently equipped with the necessary power and with sufficient means and instrumentalities for its execution to enable it to reach a correct conclusion regarding the suspension of any public officer by the President, notwithstanding the protest of the Executive, and notwithstanding his refusal to furnish papers and documents upon which he may or may not have acted in the exercise of his official discretion and power.

To hold otherwise is, in my judgment, to belittle the greatness, the dignity, the power and efficiency of the Senate of the United States; it is to declare that it does not possess inherently either the power or the means and instrumentalities absolutely essential to enable it to execute the public trusts imposed on it by the Constitution of the United States. It is to subordinate it in its practical utility, and in its power to express its will and execute its constitutional functions to the behests of the Executive; it is to surrender ignominiously its right to deliberate for itself, or form or formulate its judgment. It is to assume the position of the boy in the play-ground who refuses to play because some other boy has made a mouth at his sister without any just cause or excuse. For the Senate of the United States to refuse to do its plain constitutional duty because some other department or officer of the Government has failed to do its or his, is to obscure the splendor, and cloud the glory, and dwarf the powers that for nearly one hundred years have attached to the United States Senate.

If the spirit of questionable partianship, of factional expression and action, must germ and vegetate and bloom in these days of modern reform, let it not come from the majority in this body to dim the glorious record of the party it represents, whose best interests it would subserve, and whose power it would perpetuate; and if perchance the party in power from mistaken judgment, or for the accomplishment of party ends, or the concealment of the real motives, purposes, and acts of the administration, and to hide from public view its inconsistencies has assumed a position that is untenable, and irreconcilable with its past professions upon the subject of civil-service reform, then let not this mistake or dereliction, if such it is, be put forward by the Republican majority of the Senate as a justification for a course which can but result in obstructing in a measure the wheels of Government, and interrupting its calm and orderly administration; or for an omission on our part to fearlessly, promptly, and faithfully, with the lights before us, execute the duties impressed upon the Senate and the trust reposed in it by the Constitution.

If in the controversy now pending the majority of the Judiciary Committee is right and the President is wrong upon the main question of the right of the Senate to demand the papers, and the duty of the President or heads of Department to furnish them when called for, as I believe the Judiciary Committee on that question to be right, then it seems to me that not only our plain constitutional duty, but our duty if viewed from no other or higher or better standpoint than the mere partisan advantage that is to be derived from it in the future, would lead the majority of this Senate to make careful and thorough investigation into each individual case of suspension. And in view of the position assumed by the President, let the seal of secrecy be removed, and that investigation be made before the eyes of the world; and in case the incumbent of any particular office is found to be unworthy and the nominee is found to be worthy, advise and consent to the appointment of the latter without hesitation; and in case it is found that the incumbent was without fault, yet the nominee is altogether worthy, and it does not appear that charges affecting his integrity have been made, then to publicly announce that the person appointed is confirmed—first, because he is a competent and worthy man; and, second, because the incumbent has been suspended for and on account of political reasons only, and because of the fact that the people declared in favor of a change politically at the last election. This, it would seem to me, would be a simple act of justifiable deference, to say the least—a fair, decent, and just recognition of the rights of the people to change the administration at will in the proper manner at the ballot-box, not only in head, but in arms, legs, heart, fingers, and toes. Public opinion would then, in my judgment, be much more likely to be with the Senate, for public opinion in the end will always incline to the right side when the right is clearly demonstrated, however violent its previous oscillations.

With a spirit of liberality and patriotism and political justice, as well as political self-abnegation worthy of all praise, the Republican majority in this Senate has at its present session, while remembering the decree of the people in November, 1884, risen above every consideration of party in respect of itself and the party it represents, and placed the Presidential succession for the next three years in the hands of our political opponents; and for this act of generosity, magnanimity, if not of absolute justice on the part of a Republican Senate, the people of the Republic, irrespective of party, applauded, and as a result the strength and vigor and power of the Republican party were proportionately promoted in the land. And to my mind, whatever may be the mistakes, the inconsistencies, the shortcomings of the present President of the United States, and of the administration now in power—and I confess I do not think the list of these to the present date is more extended than is ordinarily the case with administrations—the prospective vitality, the future invincibility and power of the Republican party will still be further promoted, and new and rich garlands added to those already won, and the best interests of the Government and country subserved by the assumption of an attitude toward the administration on the part of the majority of this Senate that can not by any possibility whatever be construed by the people as being in any sense factional or obstructive, or properly regarded in any other light than that of an earnest, honest desire and effort to aid the President in giving the country a pure, peaceful, and entirely successful administration. And to such end it seems to me it is the right, if such is the desire of the President, and if in his judgment such desire and action upon his part is conformable to the platform upon which he was elected and the declarations that he has from time to time made in reference to the question of civil-service reform, to have men of his own political faith in office; and then, if, with the reins of power fully and completely in the hands and under control of the Democracy of this country, it shall two years hence fail to show a record that justly entitles it to a vote of confidence from the American people, the resumption of power by the Republican party in 1888, with its immortal record of the past and its high hopes for the future, will, under the direction of its great leaders, be as triumphant as it will be grand.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator from Indiana propose to proceed to-night?

Mr. VOORHEES. Not if I can avoid it.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to say what will take about one minute, if the Senator will pardon me.

Mr. VOORHEES. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts with pleasure.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to say for myself, having signed the report, that I do not understand it as the Senator from Oregon seems to understand it. I understand he thinks the position of the majority of the Judiciary Committee to be this: It is necessary, first, to determine, on advising and consenting to the appointment of an officer whose appointment is to cause the removal of a suspended officer, that the Senate should have the documents on file relating to the suspension; and second, the third resolution declares that the Senate will not proceed to advise and consent to proposed removals when the documents are refused which are deemed necessary by the Senate and called for in considering the matter. That is, the Senator seems to suppose that the Judiciary Committee declare that in every case of a suspension it is necessary that we should have the documents on the files, and therefore that this resolution pledges those who support it to refuse to proceed to the consideration of a proposed appointment in the case of a suspension whenever the documents are called for and not furnished.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. The Senator will allow me to remark that what I said was that the whole theory of the report—not of the resolutions but the whole theory of the report, as I understand it, from beginning to end—is to the effect that the papers are absolutely necessary in every case of suspension, and not only that they are absolutely necessary, but that it is the duty of the Senate in every particular case of a suspended officer to call for the papers.

Mr. HOAR. I do not so construe the report. Of course I do not speak for anybody but myself. That is not my opinion. I understood the report to affirm that the existence of this power in the Senate and the obedience to it by the heads of the Departments are necessary for the due and orderly discharge of our constitutional duty, just as the existence of the right of freedom of debate is necessary to the discharge of our constitutional duty; but I do not understand that the exercise of that power, or the obedience to that call in every particular case, is supposed by the committee or any member of it to be essential always to the due understanding of the case when we are called upon to proceed to consider the suspension.

Therefore, in voting for the third resolution I do not mean at all to pledge myself that in every instance of such a refusal by a head of Department, when I am perfectly satisfied that I am possessed of the case, refusal or no refusal, I am to decline to proceed to act upon the case.

I agree and I think all the Senate agree with the Senator from Oregon, that the power of seeing what are the papers on the files, on the official files, of the executive department is essential to a proper discharge of the duties of the Senate—a power never denied until this moment. And affirming that, we then say that when there comes up a particular case for our action which we can not deal with intelligently without having our call obeyed, in that particular case we can not go on to act on the case, and that is all.

Without undertaking to enter upon the debate now, as I have risen for this purpose I should like to say one other word. I have listened to and read the arguments of my honorable friends on the Democratic side of the Chamber to an extent which I am afraid, considering the character of some of them, would not be believed on my bare assertion, and I have failed to hear or see from that side of the Chamber or printed in the RECORD in the arguments made by the gentlemen over there a denial of a single proposition that the majority of the Judiciary Committee have affirmed.

What we affirm is this, that the official papers on the files of this Government are to be seen, whenever they think it is necessary for the discharge of their duty, by the two branches clothed with the powers of legislation, and that is all; and that it is not for the President or the head of a Department to determine what use we propose to make of them when we wish them. That being our affirmation, gentlemen get up hour after hour, and day after day, and week after week, and proposing to discuss the power of removal under the Constitution, cite Mr. Madison and other distinguished persons of ancient and modern times. I believe that three-quarters of the Republicans in the Senate agree precisely with the constitutional view of the power of removal that these gentlemen with so much pains and with so much repetition have affirmed.

For myself I am committed to it over and over again. I voted as my colleague [Mr. DAWES] did, as the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] did, as both the Senators from Maine I think did, and several other Senators whom I could name, for the repeal of the tenure-of-office act when I was a member of the other House. The honorable Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS], whose name is signed to this report, has furnished to the country one of the most powerful constitutional arguments on that subject. I have reiterated that opinion recently in a careful article contributed to the North American Review; and at the beginning of this session of the Senate, before this debate arose, I introduced myself a bill to repeal what is left of what is called the tenure-of-office act, agreeing with the principles and doctrines which you, Mr. President, so well stated in the debate in 1869. If the President of the United States had allowed Attorney-General Garland to send to the Senate in the usual and ordinary fashion the papers in regard to Duskin, I think it is not too much to affirm that the repeal of the tenure-of-office act would have been a law before this time.

Therefore, when gentlemen get up and, in answer to the plain and simple proposition of this report, go into elaborate constitutional disquisitions on that subject, it is an admission that they know they are wrong.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President——

Mr. MCPHERSON. I ask the Senator from Indiana to yield to me.

Mr. VOORHEES. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. MCPHERSON. As the Senator from Indiana does not wish to go on to-night, I ask for a short executive session. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. VOORHEES. Before that motion is put I should like to have some understanding——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Jersey withdraw the motion?

Mr. MCPHERSON. I do.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana has the floor.

Mr. VOORHEES. I yield to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. GRAY. I understood the Senator from Massachusetts to say that three-fourths of the Senators on that side of the Chamber agree, and certainly I understood him to say that he agrees, with the proposition which has been maintained for so many days on this side of the Chamber, that the President has the absolute power of removal; that they do not differ on that side from the contention on this side as to the power of removal resting on the constitutional rule.

Mr. HOAR. Under the Constitution; that is, we agree with Mr. Madison's doctrine.

Mr. GRAY. Exactly; and yet one of the resolutions of the report of the majority of the Judiciary Committee, to which is appended the name of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, reads:

Resolved, That it is, under these circumstances, the duty of the Senate to refuse its advice and consent to proposed removals of officers, the documents and papers in reference to the supposed official or personal misconduct of whom are withheld by the Executive or any head of a Department when deemed necessary by the Senate and called for in considering the matter.

I am somewhat mystified when I hear the Senator say that he agrees in such unequivocal language to the proposition maintained on this side, and then look at this resolution to which his name is appended.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me, I think I can very easily clear up the mist in ordinarily so clear an atmosphere as that Senator's mind.

This resolution says that when the President under the existing law asks our assent to proposed removals we shall do so and so. Does the Senator from Delaware mean to affirm, whatever may be the President's absolute power of removal under the Constitution, and whatever may be the conflict in sound principle between the scheme of the Constitution and the existing law, that when the President asks the assent of the Senate to a removal, when he himself proceeds under the statute—

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow me——

Mr. HOAR. Excuse me.

Mr. HARRIS. To ask him——

Mr. HOAR. Not at this moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts declines to be interrupted.

Mr. HOAR. When the President himself proceeds under this statute to ask our assent to a removal, we must in giving that assent to a removal be governed by the same law under which the President proceeds. The President says, "By virtue of section so-and-so of the Revised Statutes, I have suspended A." The Constitution gives to the President of the United States no power to suspend an officer. The power of suspension never was derived by Mr. Madison from the power of appointment. The power of suspension arises under this law, and as long as the law is upon the statute-book and the President comes in and says, "Having by virtue of the statute suspended A., I ask the Senate to go on under the same statute and consent to the proposed removal," are we not governed by the law as much as he, and is he not governed by the law as much as we? Now, I will hear the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. HARRIS. The question I desired to ask the Senator from Massachusetts was when and where and in what language has the President of the United States ever asked the Senate to advise and consent to a removal? He has in many instances asked the Senate to perform what the Constitution makes a duty of the Senate, to advise and consent to a nomination or to refuse to advise and consent to it, but never, so far as I am advised, has he asked the Senate to advise and consent to a suspension or a removal.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator takes that view of it, he certainly must agree with this resolution, because the resolution says that in a certain supposed case it will not be the duty of the Senate to proceed to advise and consent to a removal. That is all we say. If the Senator says the Senate never has asked at any time to proceed to give its assent to a removal, and the statute does not so operate, and the Senator says that the Senate has nothing to do with that subject, certainly the Senator can not deny his assent to an assertion of the Senate that we will not proceed to give such advice and consent.

Mr. GRAY. If the Senator will pardon me, it must be my fault, but I do not yet understand how it is that the Senator from Massachusetts was able to say emphatically and unequivocally that he agreed with the contention of this side of the Chamber that the absolute power of removal is vested in the President of the United States under our constitutional scheme of government, and yet we find in the third resolution signed by him, which we know has been prepared with great care, and has endeavored to state precisely and accurately the extremely technical ground upon which the whole debate on that side has been conducted, not that it is the duty of the Senate to refuse its advice and consent to the proposed suspension of officers, but to refuse its advice and consent to proposed removals of officers.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question, as he asked me one?

Mr. GRAY. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator think that in any conceivable case it is the duty of the Senate to give its advice and consent to the proposed removal of officers?

Mr. GRAY. I do not.

Mr. HOAR. Then you agree with me that not only in the case supposed in the resolution but in all others it is the duty of the Senate to refuse to give such advice and consent?

Mr. GRAY. I did not hear the last remark.

Mr. HOAR. I say the Senator agrees with me that in the case supposed in the resolution it is the duty of the Senate to refuse to give what it has no power to give. The Senator would go further and say then under the statute it should refuse it in all cases.

Mr. GRAY. I do not see why we want to pass a resolution to refuse to do what we have no power to do.

Mr. HOAR. That is another proposition. If the Senator has got so far that he admits, as he seems to me to admit in substance, that the statement of the resolution is an absolutely true one on everybody's theory, and he is merely disputing about the necessity of passing it, we have gotten down to a very unimportant debate.

Mr. BUTLER. It is a very important one, I should think.

Mr. GRAY. I would hail with a great deal of pleasure the mere suggestion that the learned Senator from Massachusetts agrees with the proposition which has been considered fundamental on this side; and I still have some pleasure in believing that the Senator agrees with the contention of this side that inasmuch as there is an absolute power of removal under the Constitution, this resolution that it is the duty of the Senate to refuse to advise and consent to the proposed removal of officers is somewhat inconsistent with that statement.

Mr. HOAR. I should like, if the Senator will pardon me now, to ask him one other question—he answered that so frankly—whether he does not also believe himself that it is the right of the Senate to see every paper, every official paper on the files of the Executive Departments.

Mr. GRAY. That is getting away a little from the proposition with which I started out.

Mr. HOAR. I know; but if I can get the Senator to agree to all the resolutions, I shall have accomplished a good deal by a few short questions.

Mr. GRAY. I find the Senator's name attached to the resolutions, and I only rose to ask him to explain—I have no doubt he can explain—how it is that the resolutions are consistent with the statement he has just made.

I will answer the question, which, as I understand it, the Senator from Massachusetts puts to me. I do not admit the right of the Senate, or in other words, I do not admit that there is power in the Senate, using that term in its broad as well as in its technical sense, to demand from the Executive of this Republic the reasons, the papers, or the documents. If we mean by the word "power" that that is inherent in the constitution of the Senate when performing the duty of considering nominations, I ask the Senator whence that power is derived?

Mr. HOAR. That was not my question.

Mr. GRAY. What letter of the law, what text of the Constitution, can the Senator point to from which that power, in the sense that the word "power" is used in constitutional arguments, is derived or found?

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me, I do not understand that any human being on this side of the Chamber affirms the right to demand of the Executive his reasons. My question to him did not relate to demands upon the President at all. My question was whether he denied the right of the Senate to require of the heads of Departments the production of the official papers on their files. I should like to have the Senator from Delaware, if he will, tell me what he thinks of that proposition.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President——

Mr. GRAY. I have no hesitation in telling the Senator from Massachusetts what I think of it, but I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. BUTLER. I simply want to call attention to the fact that in the resolution which was passed by the Senate and under which this whole proceeding is had there is no demand whatever for "official papers." The Senator from Massachusetts dwells upon the subject of "official papers." There is no demand for "official papers."

Mr. HOAR. But I do not get an answer to my question.

Mr. BUTLER. I wanted to call the attention of the Senator from Delaware to that fact.

Mr. HOAR. That is another proposition.

Mr. GRAY. I did not hear the Senator.

Mr. HOAR. I asked the Senator from Delaware whether he agreed with me in one proposition, and I think he answered that he did, that it was not the duty of the Senate to proceed to give its advice and consent to removals under the circumstances supposed in that resolution or any other. So he agrees with us there.

Mr. GRAY. I did agree——

Mr. HOAR. The second——

Mr. GRAY. Will the Senator from Massachusetts give me one moment?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. GRAY. I did agree with him sub modo. I agreed that it was not the duty of the Senate to advise and consent to a removal, inasmuch as it had no power under the Constitution to assent to such removal.

Mr. HOAR. Then I asked the Senator from Delaware a question, which I hoped he also would be willing to reply to, not whether we could ask the President his reasons, for nobody claims that, not in regard to a demand on the President himself, for nobody has talked about that, but whether we have a right to require the heads of Departments to make known to the Senate official papers on their files; and I will add to my question the statement that I do not conceive that the report, the resolutions, or any Senator on this side of the Chamber in this discussion has gone any further than that.

Mr. GRAY. That would only lead me right backward over the track of the discussion as made on this side of the Chamber, and which I understood the Senator from Massachusetts to say was entirely irrelevant to any position taken by himself or the majority of the Committee on the Judiciary. Yet it seems to me by that very question the Senator admits now the relevancy of all that has been said by Senators on this side in contending, in the first place, that the power of removal was absolute under the Constitution in the President; that the power of suspension under the law of 1869 was likewise absolute in the discretion of the President; and that the arguments which have been used here have been pertinent, inasmuch as they have shown that a discretion ceases to be a discretion when you can inquire into the reasons of its exercise.

Mr. HOAR. I am sorry my honorable friend will not answer the question I put, though his statement is very interesting.

Mr. GRAY. Now I will answer the question which the Senator from Massachusetts put last, for he put two or three together in a string. He asked, as I understood him, whether I admitted the right of the Senate to require from any Department of the Government or from the President——

Mr. HOAR. No, I said nothing about the President.

Mr. GRAY. Well, from any Department of the Government papers or documents. It would take too much time, I think, to show that in effect it is a requirement from the President; but taking the question as he puts it, the right to require from any Department of the Government papers or documents——

Mr. HOAR. The official papers on its files. That was my question.

Mr. GRAY. Very well, I will take the question as the Senator from Massachusetts puts it; but the term "official papers" is not in the resolutions, nor the word "file." However, as the Senator from Massachusetts has chosen to put himself upon ground somewhat different, inasmuch as he has put the question in that way and inquires as to whether I admit the right of the Senate to require official documents and official papers on file in the Departments of the Government, I say that I do not admit the right to require such papers in the sense that that admission would mean that there is lodged in the Senate as a part of one of the co-ordinate branches of this Government a right to demand from another independent and co-ordinate branch of the Government documents and papers in its custody without reference at all to the opinion of that independent department as to whether they could be with propriety furnished or not. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts what clause in the Constitution, what syllable in any law properly and efficiently confers that power upon the Senate of the United States?

Mr. HOAR. I think the Senator will find that admission in the message of the President of the United States himself.

Mr. GRAY. The message of the President of the United States is neither Constitution nor law. It is an able document I believe, and I think it concurs in its spirit and language with the Constitution. That is only shifting the issue and not answering my question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana, who is entitled to the floor, yield?

Mr. VOORHEES. I yield to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Delaware, without going into any discussion now, to the statement he has made that the power of the President to remove is complete and absolute; and without going into any discussion as to whether it is or not, as I do not believe in that sort of thing and never did as he probably knows, I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Delaware to about half a dozen messages of the President of the United States, not suspensions, which have come in within ten days to the Senate, it being in session, "I nominate A B to be collector of customs at Memphis, Tenn.," if you please, or anywhere else, "in the place of C D, whose removal for cause is hereby proposed."

What does that mean? And then other messages wherein the "removal for cause" is stricken out and the statement of the message to us, a solemn official document, is: "I nominate A B in the place of C D, whose removal"—leaving out "for cause"—"is hereby proposed." Where did the President of the United States get the authority under the Constitution, I should be glad to know, on the theory of the gentlemen on the other side, to send in a message of that kind to the Senate of the United States? "Proposed" to the Senate——

Mr. GRAY. I did not understand the last sentence.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It was a mere addition or inference from the fact of his messages that removal for cause or a removal without cause "is hereby proposed;" that is, proposed to the Senate by this communication. Whereabouts, if the President of the United States has as he thinks the absolute power of removal——

Mr. GRAY. Does he say "proposed to the Senate of the United States?"

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is exactly what he says in meaning.

Mr. GRAY. "Proposed to the Senate of the United States?"

Mr. EDMUNDS. "Whose removal for cause is hereby proposed."

Mr. GRAY. I understood the Senator from Vermont to say the language was "proposed to the Senate of the United States."

Mr. EDMUNDS. Oh, no; that would be a pleonasm that so high a scholar as the President of the United States would never think of sending to so highly cultivated a body as this is.

Mr. GRAY. I suppose it would not be altogether a suprise to us that the messages of the President of the United States should sometimes offend good taste by having pleonasms in their structure; but in considering the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts, which brought about this colloquy, I was not proposing to consider the inconsistency, if any, either of the President of the United States or any of his predecessors in the framework of his messages, but I was inquiring in good faith as to the proposition which I tried to submit, that there was no power conferred by the Constitution so far as I knew, nor by any law of the United States so far as I knew, upon the Senate of the United States to require—the word used by the Senator from Massachusetts—or demand in the sense of demanding as a right, of a co-ordinate branch of this Government reasons for official action that had been fully committed to it by the Constitution or by the laws.

Now, so far as the question of the Senator from Vermont needs an answer, it seems to me it is this: In the first place when the President of the United States—for I have not seen the messages to which the Senator has referred—says "I hereby nominate A B as collector for the port of Memphis, in place of C D, whose removal is proposed," I suppose that the ordinary, the natural construction of that language would be that he proposed that removal, and did not at all invite the participation of the Senate of the United States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from Delaware has forgotten a somewhat important word, that is: "I hereby"—that is by this message to the Senate of the United States—"propose." That is the language of the message.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the Senator from Vermont whether or not that message was communicated in open session or in executive session?

Mr. EDMUNDS. The rules of the Senate and the action of the President both say that all nominations are public and open.

Mr. BUTLER. Messages?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Messages of nominations are not secret by the express rules of the Senate.

Mr. BUTLER. Are the messages open?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Nomination messages are not to the open Senate, but the Senate rules provide that they are not secret, in express terms, and therefore all the reporters in the galleries—and they are interested spectators of this sort of thing, because in general a reporter likes to get at the truth better than anything else—know of them; these nominations are all public nominations, although they are sent to the Senate in its executive character, because that is the kind of business they relate to.

Mr. BUTLER. Are they read in open session?

Mr. EDMUNDS. They are not read in open session, but the rules of the Senate expressly provide that the fact of a nomination shall not be considered a secret, and they are published in the RECORD by the order of the Senate.

Mr. BUTLER. The confirmations.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And the nominations as well. So there is no escape for my friend from South Carolina and my friend from Delaware from this public fact that the President of the United States, within the last ten days, as all his predecessors have done since the passage of the tenure-of-office act, has sent to the Senate sundry nominations. I have copies of them, in which, in some, he states, "I nominate A B in the place of C D," for such an office, "whose removal for cause is hereby proposed;" in others he says, "I nominate A B in the place of C D," for such an office, "whose removal"—leaving out "for cause"—"is hereby proposed."

Now, if my friend from Delaware, who is as good at dialectics as anybody I know of, can persuade the Senate, or the spectators in the galleries, or our friends the reporters, to say that that is not a proposition to the Senate to agree to remove these men, I shall be glad to hear him do it.

Mr. GRAY. If the Senator from Vermont, for whose acuteness and learning I have great respect, will allow me to answer him and not the reporters in the galleries or the spectators in the galleries, I shall endeavor to do it in this simple fashion: The President of the United States, in his communications to the Senate in regard to the performance of his constitutional functions with which the Senate of the United States has under the Constitution something to do, is not limited, so far as I know, by any law or by any text of the Constitution to any particular form of communication, and I presume that any phraseology which is consistent with the rules of propriety and fairly expresses his meaning would be proper and would not be considered as an interpretation of the Constitution; and whether he considered it so or not, it certainly would not be binding on any one else. But the phraseology to which the Senator from Vermont refers seems to me simply to be this: "I nominate A B as collector for the port of Memphis, in place of C D who is hereby proposed to be removed." Now, then, it seems to me that it would be a construction more forced than any I ever knew to be placed upon the English language to say that that language so used by the President could mean anything else but that the President proposed to remove C D, and that it could not thereby be argued into any such meaning as that he was inviting the Senate to participate in that act.

It would be perfectly proper for the President of the United States to have given the Senate any other information as to his proposed official conduct, if it was couched in polite phrase, in proper parlimentary language; but that the mere information that he gives to the Senate that C D is proposed to be removed from office should mean anything else than that he proposes to remove him, is beyond my power of comprehension.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator what he supposes is the status of A B, who is mentioned in this message, meantime? Is he in office or out of office?

Mr. GRAY. Please repeat the question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the status of A B, the officer of whom the President in his message says that his "removal for cause is hereby proposed," pending the consideration of the subject? Is he removed or is he not removed?

Mr. GRAY. The one he proposes to remove?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes.

Mr. GRAY. He is removed just as soon as the other man is confirmed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And not before. That is exactly our proposition.

Mr. GRAY. Now, the Senator from Vermont has attempted in this way to make the point that a nomination by the President in the place of a person who has already occupied the office and whom the President says he proposes to remove is an invitation to the Senate to participate in the removal. That has been denied on this side over and over again. Of course that does not decide the question; but it has been the contention here (and that is just one of the points that the Senator from Massachusetts who first interrogated me on this matter seems to have ignored), that the discussion on this side has been relevant and has been directed just to that point, and has proved, if it has proved anything, that the power of the President to remove is absolute; and when he places a man in nomination to take the place of the removed officer so far as the removal is concerned the act is complete, and so far as the nomination is concerned it is complete when the Senate accedes.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to supplement what the Senator from Vermont has said by saying just one other thing in a single sentence.

Take the suspension statute. The President certainly gets his power to suspend from this statute, not from the Constitution, not from the power of removal. He does not get it anywhere else. He comes to us and says, "I have suspended this man under the statute," which he cites, "and I ask the Senate to consent to A B in his place." If the Senate does not consent to A B in his place, the suspended man goes back into office as the Supreme Court has decided. It is true the President may suspend him over again, but he may not suspend him over again. He may change his mind; he may die; the transaction may have happened in vacation before the last session of the Senate during the President's official term, and a President thinking very differently may come into power on the 4th of March. In that case the suspended man goes back into the office not by virtue of any new appointment but under his old appointment, under his old authority, under his old bond, under his old oath; and is not the question whether that thing is to happen as a result of the Senate's action upon the case, if we act one way, a matter to get instruction concerning? We may ask of a Department where official papers are on file to know what has been the conduct of that officer in office.

Mr. GRAY. I beg the Senate's pardon for speaking again, but the Senator from Massachusetts has shifted his ground. I did not——

Mr. HOAR. Yes, it is another ground I am now taking.

Mr. GRAY. I did not propose to enter into a discussion which has been conducted so ably for many days on both sides of the Senate. I merely rose in the first instance to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to his avowal that he believed the power of removal was vested in the President absolutely, and to ask how he explained a resolution which did not deal with the power of suspension under the statute, but which attempted to deal with the power of removal, and censured the President, and declared that he had violated his official duty, and to a certain extent made it the duty of the Senate to refuse to confirm any appointments made in lieu of the persons who had been removed and not suspended.

Mr. HOAR. That I answered by asking the Senator in his turn what he admitted, if he believed that in that case the Senate was bound to give its assent to the removal, which it was, and the Senator very frankly in substance said that he did not believe that the Senate should do it in that case or in any other. Having answered the Senator's question, certainly to my own satisfaction if not to his, I propounded to him the question which I just put, to see if he was willing to tell me something about that.

Mr. GRAY. But the Senator from Massachusetts has in good Yankee fashion answered all my questions by asking others, and I do not see that I should make any plainer my own position. As the Senator has just said about his own answer, I have answered quite satisfactory to myself; I am afraid it is not satisfactory to the Senator from Massachusetts. The doubt still remains in my mind as to where the Senator from Massachusetts stands upon the proposition involved in the third resolution.

Mr. EVARTS. Mr. President, as I propose to take part in the debate before it is closed, and as it may be convenient for me, in reference to engagements elsewhere, to learn whether I should interfere with any calculations or expectations on the other side if I should ask that I might be heard after the Senator from Indiana shall have made his remarks to-morrow, if there is no other gentleman on the other side who prefers to speak at that moment, I now make the inquiry.

Mr. VOORHEES. It is not perhaps for me to say, but I judge from the remarks around me that there is nobody on this side of the Chamber who expects to follow me immediately.

Mr. EVARTS. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana has the floor.

Mr. VOORHEES. Of course it is not my wish to proceed at this hour, and I shall be obliged to the Senate for the indulgence of an adjournment.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will give way, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. VOORHEES. I do so with pleasure.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 52 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 24, 1886.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I desire to move a change of reference of the bill (H. R. 4493) to amend the act of June 15, 1844, and for other purposes, from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, to which it was erroneously referred, to the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. This, the Chair understands, is a private bill, being to convey title to certain property in Dubuque.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Yes, sir; it is a private bill.

The SPEAKER. The change of reference will be made.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Would it be in order to ask unanimous consent for its present consideration?

The SPEAKER. Not at the present time. The Chair must first, under the rule, lay before the House certain executive communications and Senate bills for reference.

SURVEY OF CERTAIN LAND CLAIMS IN NEW MEXICO.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate from the Secretary of the Interior of an appropriation for surveying certain private land claims in New Mexico in lieu of the estimate heretofore submitted; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REFERENCE OF SENATE BILLS.

The SPEAKER, under the rule, laid before the House Senate bills of the following titles; which were severally read a first and second time, and referred as follows, namely:

The bill (S. 601) for the relief the Sone & Fleming Manufacturing Company, limited, of the city of New York—to the Committee on Claims.

The bill (S. 1319) to confirm entries of lands heretofore made under the land laws of the United States—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The bill (S. 831) for the relief of George S. Storrs, of Texas.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill for the relief of Mr. Storrs, which has been acted upon by the Senate, being for the removal of his political disabilities, be put upon its passage now.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objection to its present consideration.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. BEACH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BEACH. Are not bills of this character in order for consideration at Friday night sessions under the standing order of the House?

The SPEAKER. Such bills are in order, under the special order of the House, for consideration on that day.

Mr. BEACH. Then I object to its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, the bill will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 4493) to amend the act of June 15, 1844, and for other purposes, referred this morning to the Calendar.

Mr. MORRISON. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. That is equivalent to an objection.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I did not see any one rise in his place to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois demanded the regular order.

Mr. MORRISON. I now rise for that purpose.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. The gentleman from Illinois don't have to rise, I suppose. [Laughter.]

UNFINISHED CRUISERS.

Mr. GOFF. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a report from the Committee on Naval Affairs for present consideration. I am directed by the Committee on Naval Affairs to report back the resolution which I send to the desk, and recommend its adoption.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to inform the House of Representatives of the present condition of the Chicago, Boston, and Atlanta; what progress has been made in their construction; what obstacles, if any, exist to their early completion, and when in his opinion they will be ready to be placed in commission. Also that he inform the House what steps have been taken toward the construction of the two cruisers and two gunboats authorized by the act of March 3, 1885, in what manner they are to be built, when work upon them will be commenced, and what time will be required in completing them.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. GOFF moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

STATUE OF JAMES A. GARFIELD.

Mr. REID, of North Carolina. I desire to make a privileged report from the Committee on Printing. I am directed to report back with a favorable recommendation the Senate joint resolution (S. R. 39) to authorize the printing of the proceedings in Congress in accepting the statue of the late James A. Garfield, President of the United States, and to ask for its present consideration.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, &c., That there be printed of the proceedings in Congress upon the acceptance of the statue of the late James A. Garfield, presented by the State of Ohio, 12,000 copies, of which 4,000 shall be for the use of the Senate and 8,000 for the use of the House of Representatives; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to have printed an engraving of said statue to accompany said proceedings; and for engraving and printing said picture the sum of $500, or so much as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. REID, of North Carolina, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GRANT TO DUBUQUE, IOWA.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] withdraws his objection to the consideration of the bill H. R. 4493, and I renew my request that it be now put upon its passage.

Mr. RANDALL. Let the bill be read.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The bill (H. R. 4493) to amend the act of June 15, 1844, and for other purposes, was read, as follows:

Whereas by an act of Congress approved June 15, A. D. 1844, a grant was made to the county of Dubuque, Territory of Iowa, in the following words:

"That the following-described pieces or parcels of land are hereby granted and given to the county of Dubuque, in the Territory of Iowa, to wit: Two lots and a half, lying and being situate in the town of Dubuque, on the northwest corner of Seventh and Locust streets, in said county, being the same land upon which the old county jail now stands, and is designated on the Government plat of said town as 'public square.'

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the county commissioners of the county of Dubuque be, and they are hereby, authorized and empowered to make sale or otherwise dispose of the lots of land described in the first section of this act in such manner as will best subserve the interests of said county;" and

Whereas, through a clerical error, said jail lot or public square was described as being on the northwest corner of Seventh and Locust streets, when in fact it was on the northeast corner thereof; and

Whereas the said county of Dubuque, under the powers conferred by said act, sold to John and Thomas Burton the said tract of land situated on the northeast corner of Seventh and Locust streets, in said town of Dubuque, on which the old county jail stood, and designated on the Government plat of said town as "public square," the same being a rectangular tract fronting 114 feet on Seventh street and 127 feet and 11 inches on Locust street, but in the deed from said county to said John and Thomas Burton the same clerical error was made as to the corner on which said tract was situated as was made in said act: Therefore, as curative of the error aforesaid,

Be it enacted, &c., That the said rectangular tract of land on the northeast corner of Seventh and Locust streets, in the city of Dubuque, Dubuque County, State of Iowa, fronting 114 feet on Seventh street and 127 feet and 11 inches on Locust street, being the premises on which the old county jail formerly stood, and designated on the Government plat as "public square," be, and is hereby, granted and the title thereto confirmed in and to said county of Dubuque and its grantees, the said John and Thomas Burton, their heirs and assigns forever, with like effect in all respects as though correctly described in said original act and in the said conveyance thereunder by said county.

Mr. RANDALL. I am perfectly willing to hear an explanation from the gentleman from Iowa, reserving my right to object.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the gentleman from Iowa will be permitted to make a brief statement.

There was no objection.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I will simply say this is to correct a clerical error in the original act giving to the city of Dubuque two lots and a half. The property was sold to two brothers named Burton, who are dead; and the widow and only heir are in possession, and have been since 1844. This is simply to correct that mistake. The county, the city, and all interested concede the entire propriety of this change, as has been put in evidence before the Committee on the Public Lands; and the bill is unanimously reported.

Mr. RANDALL. In this House?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. In this House.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to make this remark: The original act related to the treatment by the Federal Government as to this land with the Territory of Iowa, whereas now Iowa is a State; and the usual practice has been for the Federal authority to deal with the State rather than with a county in the State. I wish to make that suggestion to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. This bill thoroughly covers the defect in the original act. There is no conflict. It is purely a local matter.

Mr. RANDALL. My suggestion is whether we should not give the power to correct this title, or rather to make some review of it, to the State authority.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I think I can assure the gentleman that the bill has been drawn very carefully, and that it is satisfactory to all the parties in interest. It has been reported by the Public Lands Committee of this House.

Mr. RANDALL. Unanimously?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Yes, sir; unanimously.

Mr. RANDALL. I make no further objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SUBSTITUTES IN THE DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I rise to make a privileged report. I am instructed by the Select Committee on Reform in the Civil Service to report back with amendments the resolution which I send to the desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, the Postmaster-General, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Attorney-General be directed, respectively, to inform the House whether or not employés in their respective Departments are permitted to employ substitutes to perform their duties, and whether or not such substitutes are employed or appointed; and, if so, by whom so employed or appointed, and the amount of compensation paid such substitutes and by whom paid, and the amount of compensation paid the regular employés during the time such substitute is employed and by whom paid, together with a list of such employés, their home post-offices, and date of their appointment, and a list of such substitutes, their home post-offices, and date of their appointment, and whether or not any of such substitutes are assigned to duties of positions included in the classified civil service, and whether or not such substitutes have passed examination by the United States Civil Service Commission and been certified for such appointment; and if such subemployment or subappointment is had or permitted, by what authority it is so had or permitted.

The report of the committee was read, as follows:

The Select Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, to whom was referred the resolution of inquiry introduced by Mr. TAULBEE, of Kentucky, relative to the employment of substitutes in the Executive Departments, have had the same under consideration, and report it back with the recommendation that it do pass, amended in the following particulars to wit:

In line 5 strike out the word "directed" and insert "requested."

In line 6, after the word "House," insert "if not incompatible with the public service."

So that the resolution as amended will read:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, the Postmaster-General, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Attorney-General be requested, respectively, to inform the House, if not incompatible with the public service, whether or not employés in their respective Departments are permitted to employ substitutes," &c.

The amendments above suggested make the resolution conform to the phraseology usual in resolutions of inquiry.

The amendments reported by the committee were agreed to.

The resolution as amended was adopted.

Mr. BLANCHARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SUSAN A. WAMACK.

Mr. TAULBEE. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (H. R. 3998) for the relief of Susan A. Wamack, administratrix of the estate of Stephen M. Farish, deceased; and to move that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from further consideration of the bill, and that the House proceed to its immediate consideration.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Susan A. Wamack, of Morgan County, Kentucky, administratrix of the estate of Stephen M. Farish, deceased, the sum of $159.29, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for services as mail contractor on route No. 9562, in the State of Kentucky, from April 1, 1861, to October 7, 1861, as reported to the Secretary of the Treasury by the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department on the 14th day of February, 1883.

There being no objection, the Committee of the Whole House was discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and it was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TAULBEE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that leave be given to the Committee on Labor to report and call up for consideration at any time, subject to general appropriation and revenue bills, such legislation as that committee may recommend for the purpose of providing for arbitration in disputes between employers and employés on railways. What I desire is that the committee may have leave to report for consideration a bill looking to that end.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman will include also bills reported from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. STEELE. And also bills reported from the Committee on Military Affairs. [Laughter.]

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. No; I confine the request to legislation reported from the Committee on Labor on the subject I have indicated.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, if the motion is confined to the object stated by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON], for one I do not object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE].

Mr. STEELE. I withdraw the objection.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON] that he introduce his resolution, and that it be printed and go over until to-morrow.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I think the request ought properly to come from the committee itself.

Mr. RANDALL. The subject is the same, whether the request comes from the committee or from an individual member.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. The whole Southwest is to-day without a wheel carrying freight.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN].

Mr. McMILLIN. I withdraw the demand for the regular order.

Mr. DUNHAM. Has any bill on this subject been introduced?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Yes, sir; three, I think.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON]? The Chair hears none, and the order is made as requested.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following titles:

A bill (S. 877) for the relief of Robert H. Anderson, of the State of Georgia;

CONGRESSIONAL LIBRARY BUILDING.

The SPEAKER. The hour for the consideration of bills called up by committees begins at ten minutes before 1 o'clock. The call rests with the Committee on the Library.

Mr. SINGLETON. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 1297) authorizing the construction of a building for the accommodation of the Congressional Library.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. CRISP in the chair) and resumed the consideration of House bill No. 1297.

Mr. SINGLETON. Mr. Chairman, knowing the anxiety of members of this House to progress as rapidly as possible with the business before it, I shall respect that feeling, and condense, as far as I can, what I have to say in support of this bill.

The question of further and better accommodations for our national but so-called Congressional Library has for a number of years past occupied the attention of Congress and the friends of literature and the arts and sciences all over the land, and the wonder has been how the representatives of a free and enlightened people could so strangely and persistently neglect to provide for and encourage its growth and development.

In the political philosophy of our country it has become an axiomatic truth that the well-being and perpetuity of our Government depend largely upon the virtue and intelligence of the people. Whatever, therefore, tends to develop these essential qualifications among those who not only determine the character of the Government and mode of administering it, but in fact constitute the Government itself, should claim the good-will and receive the protecting care of the people's representatives. It will not be denied that vice is the usual concomitant of ignorance, while virtue is for the most part the outgrowth and offspring of education and intelligence.

It is equally true that under a despotic form of government, where the people are not allowed to think for themselves in political matters, but act only as they are acted upon, there is not the same need of education and intelligence as in this democratic land of ours. There the prince or potentate thinks for his subjects, and their lives, liberty, and property interests depend largely upon the good-will of their sovereign. There the road to fortune and fame is hedged in by a thousand political restrictions and conventional prejudices, while here it is a great national highway, open to all aspirants, as well to the son of the humblest citizen as to the child of the rich and great.

All our political offices being filled by popular suffrage, how indispensable, therefore, that all the means and appliances within our reach for the education and elevation of our people should be utilized. In pursuance of this idea, our primary schools, academies, colleges, literary societies, libraries—local, State, and national—should all receive the countenance and fostering care of every lover of popular government and free institutions.

This brings me directly to the consideration of the origin, progress, and present condition of our Congressional Library and what must be done for its preservation, expansion, and future usefulness.

ITS ORIGIN.

As far back as the year 1800 Congress was impressed with the importance of building up an institution of this character, and for that purpose made an appropriation of $5,000. This may seem to have been a small amount, but it will be remembered that it was a sort of birthday present, and that our Government was in its infant state. It did not, however, escape the attention of the wise men and patriots of that day that beacon-lights—of which this was to be one—should be erected along the track of our new civilization to guide our posterity to future glory and greatness; and while we must give our fathers great credit for unexampled forecast as to the progress and possibilities of the Republic which they had founded, yet it can not be denied that "they builded wiser than they knew."

Their patriotism stimulated their hopes and opened up to their vision a country and people such as the world had not before looked upon. But facts have outrun hope or speculation, and to-day the world stands in admiration of our progress and prosperity. Can it be supposed then that they for one moment contemplated the idea that in less than a century they would be heard upon this floor, through their sons, to minify it and attempt to scout it out of Congress?

It is related in history that when the Caliph Omar, of Saracenic fame, the second from Mahomet, had overrun Syria and afterward conquered Egypt, taking possession of the city of Alexandria, he found there a library of seven hundred thousand volumes, which had been established hundreds of years before by Ptolemy Soter, and which was the pride of that seat of learning and great commercial emporium. These books were in manuscript, and not printed as ours are, and therefore the more valuable and difficult to replace, once destroyed. The question was mooted as to what this barbarian conqueror would do with this library, as he had not the slightest idea of its intrinsic value. He was consulted on the subject by Amron, one of his generals, and then came his ever memorable answer, which has stamped his name with infamy through all succeeding ages. He said:

If the books agree with the book of God (the Koran) they are superfluous; if they disagree, they are pernicious and ought to be destroyed.

The 700,000 books in manuscript were delivered to the 5,000 public baths in that great city, and answered them for fuel for the space of six months. This act of vandalism has never had a parallel in the history of the world, and it is to be hoped never will. Yet I find in this House, to my utter astonishment, gentlemen who seem to look upon our national Library with great disfavor, as though it were a step-child, and, if not ready to destroy it, at least willing and anxious to drive it from the Capitol, colonize it in some out-of-the-way place, and withdraw from it the aid and countenance of Congress. I trust this House will not be led into any such nonsense by the power of any man's declamation or the prestige which hangs about any man's name.

ITS PROGRESS.

This Library, established in 1800 as already stated, fostered by Congress from session to session, continued to grow and increase until in 1865 it numbered 92,450 volumes.

After the close of the war it seemed to receive a fresh impetus, and in 1881, just sixteen years afterward, it was found to have nearly quadrupled itself, containing 390,000 volumes! From 1881 to the present time, four years, it has had added to it 153,000 volumes, numbering as it now does 543,000 volumes of books, besides 170,000 pamphlets; 400,000 musical compositions; 300,000 engravings and other works of graphic art; 9,000 maps, English, French, Spanish, Mexican, and American—46 rare and invaluable, which once destroyed could never be replaced.

Besides this, the law books we get by exchange, gift, or purchase annually, number several thousand, and the copyright publications each year number 40,000, with a certainty of continued increase, making in all at this hour under the Capitol roof, 1,422,000 volumes of books, pamphlets, musical compositions, copyrights, engravings, maps, &c.

The cost of these, outside of exchanges, donations, and transfers by the Smithsonian Institution, has been about $750,000.

ITS PRESENT CONDITION.

In the construction of the central building of the Capitol a handsome room with wings was fitted up for the use of the Library, and although having no suitable reading-room and no rooms for the accommodation of the Librarian and his assistants, has been made to answer in some sort the purposes of a Library until its accumulation of matter has so far outgrown its capacity as to render it almost practically useless, and, in its present condition, a blight upon the character of the nation.

Its utmost capacity for shelf-room and the proper bestowment of books is 300,000, while, as before stated, there are 543,000 volumes of books, besides other publications, to be provided for—not to be corded up as in the Library-room or jammed away as we find in outlying rooms over the Library, in the crypt under the dome, and in damp, unventilated rooms under the members' sitting-room, which are under-ground, where the sunlight never comes and from which Cimmerian darkness is only banished by the burning of gaslights.

Mr. Speaker, let us suppose that some literary antiquarian, some distinguished scientific gentleman, some student of history or biography, some lover of art, should visit our Library in search of important information in connection with either of these subjects and that he were ushered into one of these dark, unventilated caverns and told that he might find what he desired in the moldy volumes before him, could it be otherwise than that a look of disgust would mantle his countenance and the conviction be fastened upon his mind that Congress was composed of a set of semi-barbarians who, like the Caliph Omar, had never learned the value of books, and while not ready to commit them to the flames, had consigned them to darkness, mildew, and moths? How ineffably contemptible would we appear in the eyes of such a man!

Let gentlemen who are treating this subject with levity and inveighing against any expenditure of money for the preservation and perpetuation of our Library listen to the words of men distinguished for great talents and learning.

Lord Bacon says:

Libraries are as the shrine where all the relics of the ancient saints, full of true virtue, and that without delusion or imposture, are preserved and reposed.

Carlyle says:

The true university of these days is a collection of books.

Mr. Dawson, of England, in his address on opening the Birmingham free library, said:

A great library contains the diary of the human race. * * * A library may be regarded as the solemn chamber in which a man may take counsel with all that have been great and wise and good and glorious among the men who have gone before him.

Again he says:

The great consulting room of a wise man is a library.

Addison, speaking of books, uses the following language:

Books are the legacies which a great genius leaves to mankind, which are delivered down from generation to generation as presents to the posterity of those who are yet unborn.

Bovee says:

Books are embalmed minds.

The great Canning gave vent to his enthusiastic love of books in the following language:

God be thanked for books. They are the voices of the distant and the dead, and make us heirs of the spiritual life of the past ages. Books are the true levelers. They give to all, who will faithfully use them, the society, the spiritual presence of the best and greatest of our race.

Now, sir, let those despise books whose whole lives are swallowed up in schemes of ambition, wealth, or pleasure, and who have never tasted of the dainties to be found in good books.

Golden volumes! richest treasure!
Sources of unbounded pleasure!
Giv'n by wits and musing sages,
Lights who beam'd through many ages!

But I must keep my promise to be brief as possible, and come at once to the consideration of the most important division of my subject.

WHAT MUST BE DONE FOR ITS PRESERVATION, EXPANSION, AND FUTURE USEFULNESS.

It has already been shown that the present accommodations are wholly inadequate to its needs. What then must we do? We are guardians and trustees of this valuable treasure which has come down to us to use, enjoy, and transmit unimpaired to succeeding generations. How shall we do that? All who have taken pains to examine into the subject will agree that a new Library building of proper proportions must be erected somewhere, either as an annex to the Capitol building or as a separate independent edifice, to be located within the city limits.

I propose to treat this question of a new building and its proper location with candor and perfect fairness, and if convinced that I am wrong in my views will fall in with those of any member who can present a better plan or location than that recommended by the committee. I trust, however, that the real friends of the Library will not be hoodwinked by professed friendship on the part of those who spoke and voted against even allowing the question to be considered by the last House. Such friends are more to be dreaded than open enemies, and their acts rather than their words are to determine their status in reference to this matter.

It is the deed and not the creed
That helps us in our utmost need.

Can any annex to the Capitol be built which will meet the necessities of the case without defacing the Capitol and ruining its beauty and grandeur? Let us examine as to this point. By an act of Congress of June 8, 1880, entitled "An act to provide additional accommodations for the Library of Congress," the joint committee of the two Houses on the Library were authorized to appoint a commission of experts in the matter of architecture to examine and report as to the practicability of adding to the present Capitol building in such way as to meet the present necessities and accruing wants of the Congressional Library. In pursuance of the power conferred by this act the Joint Library Committee appointed as such board of experts Edward Clark, Architect of the Capitol, Alexander R. Esty, of Boston, and J. L. Smithmeyer, of Washington, gentlemen all favorably known in their profession. After a careful examination of the whole subject this board of experts made each a separate report to the Library Committee and unanimously adopted the following resolution:
